DRAKE, (Sir FRANCIS) the ſon of Edmund Drake, an honeſt ſailor, and born near Taviſtock, in 1545, and brought up at the expence and under the care of Sir John Hawkins, his kinſman. He was one of the moſt diſtinguiſhed naval heroes in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. To recite all his great and ſerviceable actions, would require a volume rather than a paragraph in this work; but thoſe who chuſe to be fully acquainted with his worth, may be abundantly ſatisfied by recurring to his life in Dr. Campbell's hiſtory of the Britiſh admirals. Thus much we muſt add, that he was a man, who might be ſaid to have a head to contrive, a heart to undertake, and a hand ready to execute whatever promiſed glory to himſelf, and good to his country. The moſt diſtinguiſhing action of his life, his voyage round the globe, gives us ſuch a ſignal inſtance of courage, intrepidity, ſagacity, and diſcretion, as ſcarce ſeem to have met in one man before him. And if we conſider him as the great author of our navigation to the Weſt and Eaſt-Indies, as one who ſhewed it practicable to act againſt the Spaniards, both by ſea and land; as the introducer of tobacco into this kingdom; as the promoter of the cheſt at Chatham, for the relief of ſeamen wounded in the ſervice of their country, and of his raiſing the reputation of the Engliſh ſailors ſo high, that they were ſought after and employed by all nations of the world, we may look on him as the remote cauſe of our grandeur, and the extenſiveneſs of our commerce. As ſome account of his perſon and character may not be unacceptable, we add, that his ſtature was low, but well ſet, his cheſt open and broad, his head very round, his hair of a fine brown, his beard full and comely, his eyes large and clear, his complexion fair, and his countenance freſh, chearful, and engaging. As navigation had been his whole ſtudy, ſo he knew it thoroughly, and was perfect maſter of every ſcience, eſpecially aſtronomy, which could render him complete in the nautic art. Though he did not poliſh his ſpeech by ſtudy, yet it was ſtrong, nervous, conciſe; and though not diffuſe, eloquent, and captivating; and to conclude his character, with the words of Fuller, "He was a religious man towards God and his "houſes, where he came chaſte in his life, juſt "in his dealings, true of his word, and mer"ciful to thoſe, which were under him, hating "nothing ſo much as idleneſs."

DRU'GGERMAN, S. [drogueman, Fr. torcimanio, Ital. torgeman, Arab. an interpreter] in Commerce, a name given in the Levant to the interpreters kept by the ambaſſadors of the Chriſtians nations, reſiding at the Porte, to aſſiſt them in their treaties.

DRU'GGET, S. in Commerce, a ſort of thin ſtuff, ſometimes all wool, ſometimes half wool, half thread, and ſometimes corded, but uſually plain, and woven on a worſted chain.

DRU'GGIST, S. [droogbiſt, Belg.] one who ſells phyſical ingredients or medicines by wholeſale.

DRU'ID, S. [deru, oaks, and hud, incantation; dariah, oak, Erſe, dry, Sax. a magician, drud, Brit. oak] the prieſts and miniſters of religion amongſt the Britons, Celtic Gauls, and Germans. They were in Britain the firſt and moſt diſtinguiſhed order in the iſland, choſen out of the beſt families, and the honours of their birth, added to thoſe of their function, procured them the higheſt veneration. They were verſed in aſtronomy, geometry, natural philoſophy, politics, and geography; had the adminiſtration of all ſacred things, were the interpreters of the gods, and ſupreme judges in all cauſes, whether eccleſiaſtic or civil. From their determination was no appeal, and whoever refuſed to acquieſce in their deciſions, was reckoned impious, and excommunicated. They were generally governed by a ſingle perſon called an Arch-druid, who preſided in all their aſſemblies. Once a year they uſed to retire, or rather aſſemble in a wood, in the center of the iſland, at which time they uſed to receive applications from all parts, and hear cauſes. Their peculiar opinions are not well aſcertained by writers, though it is agreed by all, that they held the immortality of the ſoul, and its tranſmigration; that nothing could appeaſe the gods more powerfully than human ſacrifices, and that there was one ſupreme Deity who preſided over all others.

DRUM, S. [tromme, Dan. drumme, Erſe] a warlike inſtrument made of thin pieces of oak, bent in a cylindrical form, covered at each end with vellum, or parchment, which ſtretches by means of braces running from one extremity to the other; and made to ſound by beating one of the ends with ſticks generally made of braſil wood. Kettle-Drum, is that whoſe body is made of braſs or copper in the form of a kettle, and covered at top with parchment like the common one. The drum of the ear is a ſmall membrane in the inner part of that organ, which is ſo ſtretched as to convey the ſenſation of ſound, by the vibration which ſounding bodies cauſe upon it.

To DRUM, V. N. to beat a march, &c. on a drum with a ſtick. To beat or vibrate, applied to the motion of the heart.

DU'BLIN, S. [by the Saxons called Duſlin, by the Welſh Dilas-dulin, and in the Iriſh language Ballacloigh, "i. e. ſays the author of "the Syſtem, a town upon hurdles, on which "the people think the city is founded, the "ground being ſoft and quaggy." But the original words ſignify a walled town, particularly raiſed with ſtones] Its ſituation is delightful and ſalubrious, having hills on the S. plains on the W. the Liffy, a navigable river running through it to Dublin-haven into the ſea, hard by, on the E. The number of its inhabitants ſome compute at 200,000 at leaſt; others at 300,000: It was full the former number in king Charles II.'s time; and the latter calculations cannot be any exaggeration, the inhabitants having multiplied greatly ſince, and the buildings increaſing every day. This is the mart and center of commerce for the whole kingdom, with exception to ſuch ports only as are eminent for this or that particular branch. A bar at the mouth of the Liffy renders its harbour very uncommodious; ſo that ſhips of any burthen dare not venture in, nor, when in the haven, can they come to the quay, being obliged to lie three miles below the bar at Ringſend, and deliver their goods by lighters. At ebb the haven falls dry, both above and below Ringſend, except at two creeks, one on the N. and the other on the S. ſide, where at low-water is nine or ten foot depth: alſo on the N. ſide of the Hoath, a promontory forming the N. point of the bay, there is a very convenient road for large ſhips, near an iſland, called Ireland's-Eye; ſo that veſſels have a ſecure retreat unleſs in violent S. W. winds, which often drive them from their anchors out to ſea. The city is ſupplied with coals from Whitehaven in Cumberland, and Swanzy in Wales, 200 ſail of colliers being in the road at a time. In Dublin is a flouriſhing univerſity, with 600 ſtudents; and it is the ſee of an archbiſhop, with a ſtately cathedral, dedicated to St. Patrick; of which the famous Dr. Jonathan Swift was once dean; alſo a handſome palace called St. Sepulchre. Here are no leſs than thirteen parochial churches; but the lord lieutenant, and lords juſtices, go in ſtate to Chriſt's-church. As this city is the ſeat of government, the lord lieutenant (a kind of viceroy ſent from England, generally a man of the firſt quality, and changed every three years) reſides in the caſtle while he ſtays in the kingdom. Here are alſo held courts of juſtice and public offices; beſides a guildhall, tolſel, and cuſtom-houſe. Dublin has ſix gates, and a large ſtone-bridge over the Liffy, with three ſmaller, namely, Eſſex, Ormond, and Arran bridges. Its two principal ſuburbs are St. Thomas and Ouſtmantown, or Oxmantown. Dublin is governed by a mayor, and has twenty-four corporation or trading companies in it. Here are ſeveral charitable foundations; as the blue-coat hoſpital, the royal hoſpital of Kilmainham, a work-houſe, Dr. Steven's hoſpital, Mercers charitable hoſpital, and the charitable infirmary. In 1649, colonel Jones, one of the parliamentary commanders, defeated feated the duke of Ormend at Rathmines near Dublin. In the College-green is an equeſtrian ſtatue of king William III. in memory of the victory of the Boyne, on July 1, 1690. The caſtle is but an inconſiderable fortreſs. Dublin lies 64 miles W. of Holyhead, in Wales, and 268 N. W. of London. Lat. 55 deg. 12 min. N. long. 6 deg. 55 min. W.

DU'RHAM, S. [or DUESME, as in our old ſtatutes] biſhopric of, in Latin Epiſcopatus Dunelmenſis, a county palatine in the north of England. It is bounded on the S. by Yorkſhire; on the N. W. by Northumberland; and on the W. by Cumberland and Weſtmoreland; and waſhed by the ocean on the E. It is thirty-nine miles long, and thirty-five broad. The number of acres it contains are computed at 610,000, and inhabitants 97,000. The air here is ſharp, and is obſerved to be colder in the weſtern than the eaſtern parts; the latter having warm breezes from the ſea. In the former the fields are barren, the woods thin, and the hills bare; but the iron and lead mines make ſome amends for the ſterility of the ſoil. The eaſt, ſouth, and north parts are more fruitful. In general the biſhopric is thick ſet with towns, and very rich in mines of coals, particularly about Sunderland, Hartlepool, and other places, which are imported into London. In moſt parts the coal lies near the ſurface. The abundance of this mineral production in the biſhopric, may be one reaſon why the inhabitants apply themſelves little to any other traffic or manufacture. This country has about ſixteen rivers; the principal of which are, 1. The Tees, and into it run the Laden, Hude, Lune, Bauden, Skern, with other brooks. 2. The Were, which is formed by the Kellop, Wellop, and Burdop, with the Gaunleſs, &c. Moſt of theſe abound with fiſh, particularly ſalmon; and they form conſiderable ports well frequented by colliers of the greateſt burthen, which are a nurſery of ſailors for the royal navy. This county ſends to parliament only two knights of the ſhire, and two burgeſſes for its capital of the ſame name.

DU'RHAM, S. city of, the capital of the county palatine of the ſame name, in the north of England, in Latin Dunelmum, and by the Saxons called Dunholm, as ſituated on a riſing ground, and ſurrounded with a river, namely, the Were, over which are two large ſtone-bridges. The city is walled round, and defended by a ſpacious and ſtrong caſtle. Here are ſix pariſh-churches, beſides the cathedral, which is dedicated to St. Cuthbert. The ſuburbs are Elvetbridge, and Framgate, leading to Newcaſtle. It is the ſee of a biſhop: hence the county is commonly called the biſhopric; and he is a temporal as well as ſpiritual lord in it, though king Henry VIII. abridged the temporalities very much. Durham is one of the beſt biſhoprics in England, and the prebends, and other church-livings, are very rich. It is governed by a mayor, and ſends two members to parliament. The weekly market here is on Saturday, where all ſorts of proviſions and neceſſaries for the conveniency of life are very cheap, as well as good. It has annual fairs on March 31, for three days; the firſt day horned cattle; the ſecond ſheep and hogs; and the third horſes; Whitſun-Tueſday, and September 25, the like. It lies ſixteen miles from Newcaſtle, and 195 from London.

E A G

E, The fifth letter, and ſecond vowel of the Engliſh alphabet. The form of the capital E is borrowed by us from the Romans, who had it from the Greeks, and they from the Phenicians, who had the ſame character from the Hebrews. The form of the Hebrew Heth, as it appears on medals, ſeems to be the ſame as that of this capital letter, allowing for the method of writing uſed by the Oriental nations, which was from right to left. Our ſmall e is the ſame as that of the Saxons, who ſeem to have formed it from their capital e, which is not angular, like the Roman, but roundiſh and with a ſtrait ſtroke projecting from the middle, as that of the Goths was likewiſe. In is the moſt frequent vowel of any in the Engliſh language. When a word ending in an e final is formed into an active participle, the e is dropped; thus give, when formed into an active participle, is written giving, not give-ing; and this is obſerved likewiſe in words which are compounded; thus judge makes judgment. In Muſic, it denotes the tones e, mi, la. In the Calendar, it is the fifth dominical letter. On the Compaſs, it marks the Eaſt point; as E. S. E. i. e. Eaſt South Eaſt. Among Writers or Authors, it ſtands for example, or exempli, as e. gr. exempli gratia, or, for example.

EACH, Pron. [elc, ælc, Sax. elch, Belg. ilk, Scot.] either of two; every one of any number. The correſpondent word is other. "Bright'ning each other." Addiſ.

EAD or ED, [Sax.] in compound words, and ædig in the ſimple, denotes happineſs or bleſſedneſs. Thus Eadward, or Edward, is a happy preſerver. Eadgar, happy power. In ſome caſes it ſignifies the ſame as the Saxon eath, i. e. eaſy, gentle, mild.

EA'GER, Adj. [eager, Sax. fierce or vehement, aigre, Fr. egr, Brit. agro, Ital.] earneſt, ardent; longing; impetuous; hot or vehement of diſpoſition; quick; buſy. Sharp or ſour, applied to the taſte.

The original word ſignifies the building a ſtructure, and is beautifully applied to the improvements made in knowledge or religion, which begin low like the foundation of a houſe, and increaſe upwards, till we are carried nearer to the exalted beings in heaven both with reſpect to their knowledge and virtues.

E'DIFICE, S. [ædificium, Lat.] a building or houſe, generally applied to ſignify ſome large or pompous building.

E'DIFIER, S. one who improves another by inſtruction.

To E'DIFY, V. A. [edifico, Lat.] to build; to improve by inſtruction; to inſtruct, or teach.

E'DILE, S. [ædilis, Lat.] the title of an officer among the Romans, who reſembled the city marſhal in London, or a ſurveyor.

E'DINBURGH, S. (city of) the metropolis of the ſhire of its own name, or Mid-Lothian, and of all Scotland. It was formerly the royal ſeat of its kings and parliaments, as it is ſtill of the ſupreme courts of judicature, particularly the court of ſeſſion, conſiſting of ſixteen judges, one of which is ſtiled Lord Preſident; juſticiary court, commiſſary court, &c. The northern Scots, its antient inhabitants, called it Duned or Dun-eden, i. e. Eden-hill, or the hill of the Edeni, whom Ptolemy, from miſtake, as ſome think, calls Ottodeni for Scottodeni. In Latin it is called Edinum, Edinedunum, or more properly, Edinburgum. It ſtands high; and among its ſeveral ſtreets is a remarkable broad one, above half a mile long, to the Nether-bow, with handſome ſtone-houſes on each ſide; but ſome buildings upon it, called the Lucken-booths, and the guard-houſe, very much interrupt, if not diſgrace it. At the weſt end of this ſtreet is a very ſtrong caſtle, or rather citadel, upon a rock, inacceſſible on all ſides, but at one avenue opening to the ſaid ſtreet; and this being ſtoutly fortified with cannon and regular works, the Highlanders in vain attempted it in 1745. Here is a garriſon and governor, in which office was the late General Gueſt at that time. Alſo a royal palace of hewn ſtone, where King James I. of England was born. In this place the regalia, records of ſtate, and national magazine of arms and ammunition, are kept. Two wells in the rock plentifully ſupply the garriſon with water. The city has the two pennies Scots act for the carrying on their public works, which they employ to great advantage. They drive a good trade here, and ſend one member to the Britiſh parliament. The ſite of Edinburgh being rocky, is the occaſion of great inconveniencies for want of neceſſary-houſes; but theſe the governors of the place take as much care as poſſible to prevent. It lies 320 miles north from London, lat 55 deg. 58 min. north, long. 3 deg. weſt.

EDI'TION, S. [editio, Lat.] the publication or impreſſion of a book.

E'DITOR, S. one who prepares a manuſcript for the preſs, and corrects the errors of the proof-ſheets while it is printing.

To E'DUCATE, V. A. [educatum, ſupine of educo, Lat.] to bring up a perſon; to give inſtruction to a perſon during his minority, which may either ſerve to improve his underſtanding, or to regulate his morals.

ELE'CTORAL, Adj. having the title, dignity and privilege of an elector.

ELE'CTORATE, S. the territory, dominion or government of an elector.

ELE'CTRE, S. electrum, Lat. from elicio to attract amber; which, when excited by friction, having the quality of attracting bodies, gives name to that species of attraction which is excited by rubbing, it being called electricity; and the bodies thus attracting are for the same reason named electrical. A mixed metal. "Change silver plate or vessel into compound stuff being a kind of silver electre." Boyle.

ELE'CTRIC, or ELE'CTRICAL, Adj. [See Electre] having the power of attracting by friction, or without magnetism; produced by an electric body.

ELECTRI'CITY, S. a virtue or property in some bodies, whereby they will attract others when excited by attrition or friction. The great improvements made in this branch of natural philosophy within these late years, has opened to the mind a large field of knowledge before concealed, has introduced a new foundation for the systematical philosopher to build on, and enabled the student to make some discoveries, which are of no small service to mankind. By finding the analogy between electricity and lightning, methods have been invented to secure us from the effects of that dreadful phænomenon; the increase of vegetation has been found to be greatly augmented by several experiments, whereby plants have been electrified; but its services in medicine, in such cases as have been too obstinate for our present class of remedies to remove, are highly worthy of notice.

To ELE'CTRIFY, V. A. to communicate, or endue with the electric virtue. To electrify plus, is to communicate a greater degree of the electric matter to a thing, than it naturally possesses. To electrify minus, is to exhaust the electrical matter from a substance which is fully charged with it.

To ELECTRI'SE, V. A. to communicate the electrical power to any substance that has it not, or has it to a less degree.

ELE'CTUARY, S. E'LEMENT, S. [elementum, Lat.] the first or constituent principle out of which any thing is made; a principle into which any thing is resolved, and which will admit of no further resolution. The elements of the Peripatetics are, fire, water, air, and earth, of which they imagine all things to be composed. The Cartesians hold three elements, their materia subtilis, and two others of a denser kind. The chemical elements are seven, those of the Peripatetics, to which they add salt, sulphur, and mercury. Figuratively, the letter of any language; the lowest or first rudiments or grounds of any art or science.

To EL'EMENT, V. A. to compound of elements. "In those, said to be elemented "bodies."

E'LEMI, S. in Pharmacy, improperly called a gum, but, in reality, a tranſparent reſin, of a whitiſh colour, intermixed with yellowiſh particles, very often of the colour and conſiſtence of wax. It is ſuppoſed to be produced from a tall tree of the olive kind, and is brought in flattiſh or cylindrical maſſes from Ethiopia.

E'LEPHANT, S. [elephas, Lat.] in Natural Hiſtory, the largeſt of all the quadrupede or four-footed animals. It is furniſhed with a trunk or long cartilaginous tube hanging between its teeth, with which it feeds itſelf, or aſſaults its enemy when provoked. It is ſaid to have no joints in its legs, and on that account to ſleep ſtanding, and leaning againſt a tree. It has two large taſks, one ſtanding out on each ſide of its trunk, ſome of which are as large as a man's thigh, and a fathom in length. It feeds purely on vegetables. Its nature is ſo gentle, that any animal may approach it without fear, and ſo dangerous when provoked, that none can eſcape its fury; its docility is remarkable; its ſtrength needs no other evidence, than the accounts given us by the ancients of its carrying both men and towers on its back in war; and its nimbleneſs and dexterity is ſo highly ſpoken of, that a mere abridgment of what has been delivered on that head, would appear romantic. Elephant is uſed figuratively, for ivory. "High o'er the "gate, in elephant and gold." Dryd.

ELEPHANTI'ASIS, S. [Lat.] in Medicine, a ſpecies of leproſy, ſo called from covering the ſkin with blotches and incruſtations, like thoſe which appear on the hide of an elephant.

ENG'LAND, S. [pronounced Ingland, ſo called from the Angles who ſettled in theſe parts in the year 449, and were ſituated on the continent between the Saxons and Jutes] the name given to that part of our iſland, ſouth of the Tweed, though ſometimes extended ſo as to include the whole iſland of Great Britain. Whether we conſider the extenſiveneſs of its commerce; the fertility of its ſoil; the improvements it has made in manufactures and arts; the ſurpriſing works of genius performed by its natives; the number of its inhabitants; the admirableneſs of its conſtitution, which takes in the advantages of all the forms of government, without any of their inconveniencies; the character it has borne for military feats abroad, and exact diſtribution of juſtice at home; the liberty it gives to every individual of performing the rites of religion without compulſion, and of forming them after their own inclination, without the leaſt reſtraint. If we conſider the progreſs it has made both in the ſciences and polite arts; that it can boaſt a Newton at the head of the philoſophic tribe; a Locke at the head of its metaphyſicians; that a Wren, a Jones, and a Gibſon were its architects; a Kneller, a Jervas, a Pine are among its painters; a Strange, a Grignion, and Vertue were its engravers; that a Shakeſpear has been its dramatic writer; a Milton its epic poet; a Pope has been celebrated among the cultivators of its poetry; a Stanley, Boyce, and Purcel were its muſicians; a Harvey, a Sydenham, a Mead, a Sloane its phyſicians; a Flamſtead, Halley, and Bradley its aſtronomers; a Tillotſon, Stillingfleet, Bingham, Bull, and Warburton its divines. I ſay, if we conſider theſe only, and at the ſame time remark it has always been a ſcourge of tyrants, and a bulwark to the liberties of Europe, we muſt confeſs that this ſpot ſeems highly favoured by Providence, and worthy of the character it has always borne among foreigners, who, at the ſame time as they praiſe, muſt wiſh to have been its natives.

ESQUIRE, S. [pronounced ſquire, eſcuier, Fr.] the armour-bearer, or attendant upon a knight. A title of dignity next to that of knight, called in Latin, ſcutifer and armiger, and ſchilpor among the Goths, from their coat of arms, which they bore as badges of their nobility, or becauſe they carried the armour of princes and great men. Every knight was anciently ſerved by two of them, who carried his helmet and buckler, holding lands of him in eſcuage. At firſt the name was a name of office only, and probably crept in among the titles of honour in the reign of Richard II. The title is now given to all the ſons of noblemen and their heirs male for ever; the four eſquires of the king's body; the eldeſt ſons of baronets, and of knights of the Bath, and their heirs in the right line; to thoſe that ſerve the king in any worſhipful employment, &c. and to ſuch as his majeſty gives arms, and creates eſquires, with a collar of SS. of ſilver, who were formerly called white ſquires. The chief of ſome families enjoy this title by preſcription, and thoſe that bear any ſuperior office in the commonwealth, as high ſheriff of any county, and he who is juſtice of the peace, together with under barriſters, and graduates of the univerſity, during their reſidence at college.

ESSEN'TIAL, S. being or eſſence. "Re-"duce — to nothing this eſſential." Par. Loſt. Nature, or conſtituent principles. "The "plague of ſin has eaten into his very eſſen-"tials." South. A chief or principal point.

ESSEN'TIALLY, Adv. [eſſentialiter, low. Lat.] principally.

ES'SEX, S. ſo called from the Eaſt Saxons, a county of England, and a kind of peninſula. It is waſhed on the E. by the German ocean, on the N. by the river Stour, which parts it from Suffolk and Cambridgeſhire; on the W. by the river Lea, which divides it from Middleſex, and by the river Stort, which ſeparates it from Hertfordſhire; and on the S. by the Thames. Its extent from E. to W. is forty miles, and from N. to S. thirty-five, though the dimenſions given of it vary. It contains, according to Templeman, 1,240,000 acres, 22 (27) market-towns, and 415 pariſhes; beſides 46 parks, one foreſt, and a caſtle, with 208,800 inhabitants. Beſides the two knights of the ſhire, it ſends two members for each of the towns, Malden, Colcheſter, and Harwich. It is one of the ſhires in the home circuit, and gives title of Earl to the Capel family. The air of Eſſex is in general temperate; but near the ſea and the Thames moiſt and aguiſh, though the marſh-lands there abound with rich paſtures, corn-lands, and cattle, as horſes, fat oxen, and ſheep; it abounds alſo in wood and wild fowl; and its northern parts, eſpecially about Saffron-Walden, produce large quantities of ſaffron; after three crops of which the ſoil produces barley for two others ſucceſſively, without manure. In other parts are hops. In Eſſex the ſoil is beſt where the air is worſt, and the former worſt where the latter is beſt. No county in England affords proviſions of all ſorts more plentifully than this, not only for its own conſumption, but the ſupply of the London markets. Its calves are admired for the whiteneſs and delicacy of their fleſh; ſo that theſe, and the number of their ſtiles (from the infinity of ſmall incloſures in Eſſex) have become proverbial. They have plenty of fiſh of all ſorts from the ſea and their rivers; particularly vaſt quantities of fine oyſters on the coaſt, which are ſent up pickled to London, eſpecially from Colcheſter, and in ſmall kegs. In the marſhes of Eſſex it is frequent to meet with men that have had from five or ſix to fourteen or fifteen wives: and ſometimes it is ſaid more, even twenty-five and thirty-five. The reaſon is, that the farmers here have wives from the uplands, who ſoon contract agues, and go off in little more than a year: nor do the men hold it out any more in theſe parts, than in other countries. The marſh-lands of Eſſex are in the three hundreds of Barſtable, Rochford, and Dengy. In another part of the county is the hundred of Hinkford, which is ſo large as to be one-eighth of the whole.

ESSO'IGN, or ESS'OIN, S. [exoine, Fr. an excuſe] in Law, an excuſe allowed for the abſence of a perſon who is ſummoned to appear in a court of juſtice; the perſon who is excuſed for abſence from a court of juſtice.

It iſſues from two ſources northwards of Erzerum, in Turcomania, in lat. 40 deg. 16 min. north; both which unite their ſtreams three days journey below that city, to which place ſmall veſſels may come up; but its navigation is rendered dangerous by a very rocky channel. Its courſe at firſt is from E. to W. through Turcomania; but meeting with Mount Taurus, it turns to the S. dividing that province from Natolia, and then running on S. E. ſeparates Syria from Aſſyria. It afterwards paſſes through Eyraca, Arabia, or Chaldea; and having joined the Tigris, continues the ſame courſe to Baſſora; forty-eight miles below which city it diſcharges itſelf into the Perſian gulph. Meſopotamia or Padanaram is almoſt ſurrounded by the Euphrates and Tigris.

EURO'CLADON, S. [Gr.] a wind which blows between the eaſt and north in the Mediterranean, and is very dangerous. It is of the nature of a whirlwind, falls ſuddenly on ſhips, makes them tack about, and ſometimes cauſes them to ſounder. "There aroſe a tempeſtuous "wind called Euroclydon." Acts xxvi. 14.

EU'ROPE, S. one of the grand ſubdiviſions or quarters of the terraqueous globe, by the Romans called Europa, as it is now by the Italians and Spaniards, and Europe by the Engliſh and French. The Turks call it Rumeli or Aſfrank, the Georgians Frankoba, and the reſt of Aſia Frankiſtan. On the N. it has the Frozen ocean or White ſea; on the S. the Mediterranean ſea, dividing it from Africa. On the E. it is bounded by Aſia, from which it is parted by the Archipelago, the Euxine or Black ſea, and the Palus Mœotis; and from thence, by a line drawn from the Tanais or Don, almoſt to the Oby in Muſcovy; and on the W. it has the Atlantic ocean. Europe extends itſelf between lat. 34 and 80 deg. N. and between long. 5 and 80 deg. reckoning the firſt meridian to paſs through Teneriff. Its breadth as a continent, from the north cape to cape Matapan in the Morea, is about 2600 miles; and its length, from the mouth of the river Oby in the E. to cape St. Vincent in Portugal W. about 2800. Tho' Europe be the leaſt of the four parts of this lower globe, it has much the advantage of the others with the regard to the mildneſs of its climate, the fertility of its ſoil in general, producing great plenty of corn, cattle, wine, oil, and in ſhort all things neceſſary, not only for the ſupport, but eaſe and luxury of human life; more eſpecially noted for the comelineſs, ſtrength, courage, ingenuity, and wiſdom of its inhabitants, the excellence of their governments, equity of their laws, the freedom of their ſubjects; and, what ſurpaſſes all others, the purity of their religion, namely, the ſublime doctrines of the great and divine lawgiver Jeſus Chriſt, and of his immediate apoſtles. After the flood, Noah's poſterity peopled Europe: but whether, as is generally believed, by the deſcendants of Japhet, who came from Aſia Minor over the Helleſpont into Greece, or thoſe of Shem paſſing by land between the Caſpian ſea and Palus Mœotis, who went through Tartary and Scythia into Scandia or Scandinavia, and from thence ſpreading afterwards over France, Germany, &c. is not ſo clear. Europe, however, has for many ages been extremely populous, and ſome of her inhabitants illuſtrious for their courage, wiſdom, and virtue: ſo that at different times they conquered by this means the greateſt part of Aſia and Africa, ſubjecting theſe countries to the two empires of Greece and Rome. And within theſe latter ages, namely, three or four centuries ago, almoſt one half of the earth formerly unknown, has been diſcovered by Europeans, and poſſeſſed by the colonies they have ſent thither. Chriſtianity is profeſſed throughout Europe, except in that part of it occupied by the Turks, who are diſciples of Mahomet. But, by reaſon of the corruptions and innovations gradually introduced into the church of Rome, the weſtern church is divided; ſo that Italy, Spain, Portugal, France, part of Germany, and the Netherlands, with Poland, ſtill follow the doctrine of the Romiſh church: whilſt England, Scotland, Ireland moſtly, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, great part of Germany, the Seven United Provinces of Holland, Switzerland, &c. have embraced the reformation, and profeſs the Proteſtant religion. But in Ruſſia, ſome few parts of Poland, in Walachia, Moldavia, Podolia, Volhinia, Greece, &c. the doctrine of the eaſtern or Greek church is followed. The Europeans have been moſt renowned for learning and arts; for they have brought all the ſciences to a greater perfection than the Aſiatics or Africans ever had done. Beſides the invention and improvement of many uſeful arts, navigation particularly is entirely owing to the induſtry and genius of the inhabitants of this part of the world. The languages of Europe are all derived from theſe ſix original ones, the Greek, Latin, Teutonic or Old German, Celtic, Sclavonic, and Gothic: different combinations and dialects of which, with accidental additions, being the language of all the conſiderable parts of Europe, except Tartary and Turky.

It is the capital of Devonſhire, and called the London of the W. there being no city between it and the Land's-end, which is 108 miles diſtant. It is walled round, and was the ſeat of the Weſt-Saxons. Here ſeveral Roman coins and other antiquities have been dug up. Formerly there were ſo many monaſteries in the place that it was called Monkton. Beſides chapels, and five large meeting-houſes, here are ſtill twenty churches in the city and ſuburbs; among which is the cathedral of St. Peter, where it is common to ſee hundreds of people at morning-ſervice by ſix, ſummer and winter. This is a mayor-town, and county of itſelf, which ſends two members to parliament. It has a long bridge over the Ex, with houſes on both ſides. Here are four principal ſtreets, (one of which is called the High-ſtreet) all centering in the middle of the town, and called Carfox, a corruption, ſays my author, of the old Norman quatre voix for voyes, i. e. the four ways, though it would rather ſeem to be carreau, the ſquare. Here is plenty of water, which is conveyed by pipes; and an old caſtle called Rougemont, where the aſſizes are kept. In this city and ſuburbs are hoſpitals, a work-houſe, alms-houſes, and charity-ſchools, together with a county-infirmary of late erection. Formerly ſhips could load and unload at the water-gate; but the navigation having been obſtructed, ſluices and gates have been ſince made by act of parliament; ſo that veſſels of 150 tons can come up to the quay. In this town is a briſk trade, particularly in ſerges; and here are twelve companies. It is the ſee of a biſhop, which Edward the Confeſſor tranſlated hither from Crediton. Topſham, ſix miles below the town, may be looked upon as the port of Exeter. It gives title of Earl to a branch of the Cecil family. It lies twelve miles N. of the Engliſh channel, and 172 W. of London. The weekly markets here are on Wedneſdays and Fridays, and annual fairs on Aſh-Wedneſday, Whitſun-Monday, Auguſt 1, and December 6, for horned cattle, horſes, and almoſt every commodity.

FAB

F, The ſixth letter of the alphabet, and the fourth conſonant. Its ſound in Engliſh is invariable, formed by the compreſſion of the whole lips and a forcible breath; it reſembles very much that of the V; and its ſhape in the Iſlandic or Runic alphabet is diſtinguiſhed from it only by having a dot in the middle. Its form is the ſame in the Roman and Saxon alphabets as in ours, and is by ſome ſuppoſed to be made by placing two Γ gammas over each other thus $\binom{\Gamma}{\Gamma}$; others again imagine it to have ſprung from the Greek Φ, which being wrote with the ſtrait ſtroke firſt, and the upper and lower parts of the omicron, which croſſes it, at different times, might have accidentally given riſe to its form. In medicinal preſcriptions it ſtands for fiat, or let it be made. In Muſic, the fourth note of the gamut; and when ſtanding at the beginning of the line, the baſs cleff. Among the numeral letters it ſignifies 40; and when a daſh was drawn over it thus, $\overline{F}$ 40,000. On monumental inſcriptions, it ſignifies filius, or ſon.

FEZ, S. (kingdom of) in Africa. It has the Mediterranean sea on the N. the Atlantic ocean on the W. the river Marbea or Umarabea on the S. where it divides Fez from Morocco, and is bounded on the E. by an imaginary line drawn from the mouth of the river Meluya or Mulvia, to Mount Atlas, dividing it from the kingdom of Algiers. It was formerly part of Mauritania Tingitana, is somewhat larger than Morocco, and divided like it into seven provinces. Its extent from E. to W. is about 270 miles, that is, from long. 1 deg. 20 min. to 7 deg. W. where broadest, and nearly of the same breadth from N. to S. that is, from lat. 31 to 36 deg. This kingdom is fertile in grain, fruit, cattle, wax, and honey; but would be much more so, did the inhabitants cultivate it duly, the Fezians being contented with a bare sufficiency, and scrupulous of sending grain out of the kingdom. Here are good iron-mines; but they are so ignorant of manufacturing them, that they only make nails, and some other coarse utensils. Their principal river is Sebu or Cebir, which is very rapid, rising in Mount Celego, in the province of Cuz, and descending to the Atlantic ocean, is said to carry with its stream stones of an hundred weight. It runs within two short miles of Fez city through vast ridges, receiving several other rivers in its course; yet over it is a bridge said to be 150 fathoms long: none of these rivers are navigable. The only carriage is by land upon camels, horses, and dromedromedaries, for expedition. Fez had its own kings, but for ſome time it has been ſubject to Morocco. The Spaniards and Portugueſe have ſome places on the coaſt; the principal of thoſe belonging to the former, are Mazalquiver, Penen, Melilla, and Ceuta: the ſiege, or rather blockade, of the laſt of which by the natives may be ſaid ſtill to be carried on. FRANCE, S. Gallia in general, a large kingdom of Europe, very advantageouſly ſituated in the middle of the temperate zone. It owes its preſent name of France to the Franks, who came from Germany into Gaul, the latter ſo called from the Galli or Celtæ, who in the fifth century poſſeſſed themſelves of this country from the Rhine to the mouth of the Loire. France at preſent lies between lat. 43 and 51 deg. N. The Royal Academy make it 13 deg. of longitude, namely, from the extremity of Britany near Uſhant, that is, from Conquet, which lies five degrees W. of London, to Straſburgh in Alſace, which is about eight degrees E. of London. So that its length from the Pyrennean mountains in the S. to Dunkirk in the N. is eight degrees and a half, or 170 leagues, i. e. 510 miles, reckoning ſixty miles to a degree of longitude: and in breadth, from the uttermoſt point in Britany to Straſburgh above-mentioned, about 495 miles: but its breadth decreaſes conſiderably going from Breſt to the S. and N. It is in ſhort nearly a ſquare of 540 miles, only Britany extends to the W. farther than any other province. On the N. it is ſeparated from England by the Britiſh channel; on the N. E. it confines on the Spaniſh, now Auſtrian Netherlands; on the E. it is bounded by Germany, Switzerland, Savoy, and Piedmont, in Italy; from the laſt of which it is ſeparated by the Alps; on the S. it has the Mediterranean ſea, and alſo the Pyrennean mountains, which divide it from Spain; and on the W. it is waſhed by the Weſtern or Atlantic ocean. The air is ſalubrious, and ſubject neither to great cold, nor exceſſive heat, the degrees of both varying according to the different ſituation of its provinces. In the S. parts of France, as Dauphiny, Provence, and Languedoc, the winters are generally very ſharp, but of ſhort continuance; and the ſeaſons in France are more regular than they are in England. This is a very pleaſant country, through which run ſeveral fine rivers that render it very fruitful. The principal of theſe, which are alſo navigable, are the Seine, the Loire, the Garonne, and the Rhone, &c. It abounds in corn, fruit, wine, oil, cattle, tame and wild fowl, hemp, and flax. The ſea-coaſts yield abundance of fiſh, and ſalt ſufficient for them and their neighbours, principally made at the iſle of Ré, Rochfort, and the coaſt of Saintonge. Here are likewiſe mines of lead, iron and copper, and ſome of gold and ſilver; but theſe laſt are not worked. The principal commodities which France exports are wine, brandy, fine and other linen, canvas, paper, ſalt, wrought ſilks, druggets, and other ſtuffs; ſeveral wrought goods, as gloves, laces of all kinds, &c. The people are a medley of the the poſterity of the antient Gauls, principally of the Romans, Franks or Francogians, Viſigoths, and Burgundians. Cæſar ſays of the Gauls, that they were ready witted, but raſh and unſteady; which character in general agrees pretty much with the modern French; though with ſeveral exceptions, ſince France has produced learned and induſtrious men in all arts and ſciences, eſpecially in the preſent age; and even a woman has been found an excellent critic in philology. They abound in compliments, and are very civil, eſpecially to ſtrangers, have a natural freedom in their converſation, which they frequently overact, and mix with levity, if not hypocriſy. Both the men and women are full of talk. In their dreſs they are ſomething fantaſtical, but in general have an air of gentility. The French, but particularly the Normans, are very much addicted to law-ſuits. The gentry generally ſcorn trade, which makes them fond of obtaining offices, and poſts of honour or profit under the crown. In war the French have been found furious in attacking, but quick in retreating: which tho' ſtill in a great meaſure applicable to them, yet thro' ſtrict diſcipline their ſoldiers will endure the fatigues of a camp or ſiege, and behave valiantly in battle, as well as rally, and make good retreats. The religion of the antient Gauls was Paganiſm, even to the offering of human ſacrifices; but this barbarity they gradually laid aſide. Chriſtianity was received very early in the ſouthern parts of France; and St. Irenæus, biſhop of Lyons, came hither in the middle of the ſecond century. But the Franks being Pagans, it was again ſuppreſſed, till Clovius V. being converted by St. Vaaſt, the firſt biſhop of Rheims, it was reſtored. The ancient language of the Gauls was the ſame with that of our ancient Britons: but being compoſed of the German and Gothic, as well as the Latin, which its reſpective invaders brought with them, the laſt has much the greater ſhare in it. The preſent language is voluble, and very much refined by the Royal Academy and the modern French writers; but being thus extremely enervated by exploding a great many expreſſive old words, it is neither very copious nor fit for heroic compoſition. However, though the French tongue has nothing of ſignal majeſty nor ſtriking manlineſs in it, it is at preſent uſed in moſt courts in Europe, and the moſt generally underſtood of any modern language in Chriſtendom. The number of inhabitants in France was formerly reckoned at 19,000,000: but being greatly diminiſhed thro' perſecution for religion, the ravages of war, &c. it hardly riſes now to 15,000,000. They are extremely devoted to their prince, tho' he treats them like ſlaves, and mighty full of themſelves, even to a contempt of all other nations. Their manufactures are conſiderable, and their foreign trade alſo to Spain, Italy, and Turky; though that to the Weſt and Eaſt Indies ſeems in the preſent war with England to be entirely at a ſtand, as moſt of their ſettlements have been taken from them in Aſia, America, and Africa. The articles of their wine, ſilk, linen, and lace, ſent into Great Britain, are very beneficial to France, as the returns are principally in caſh. France was divided, not many ages ago, into twelve provinces, with a parliament to each, without whoſe conſent no law or levying of money could paſs, till the cardinals Richlieu and Mazarin, ſucceſſors to each other in the miniſtry, made the kings of France abſolute; ſo that the parliaments are at preſent aſſembled only to paſs ſuch arrets or laws as he pleaſes to ſend them: yet in civil and criminal cauſes theſe are the laſt reſort, unleſs the king interpoſes. Theſe conſiſt of preſidents and inferior judges, who purchaſe their places; whence ariſes a great revenue to the crown. The parliament of Paris is the moſt conſiderable in all France, and to it the king comes to ſee his own acts recorded. Here the dukes and peers of France ſit, beſides the ordinary judges: and this court alone takes cognizance of all offences committed by peers, where the king does not iſſue a ſpecial commiſſion for their trial; as alſo of all matters relating to the crown, excluſively of the other parliaments. The religion of this country publickly tolerated [ſince the revocation of the edict of Nantz for the Calviniſts or Reformed in 1685] is the Roman Catholic: but they ſeem leſs devoted to the pope than other nations of that communion. Their princes have frequently quarrelled with the head of the church, for aſſuming too much power; particularly Lewis XIV. The French would never receive the council of Trent, at leaſt with regard to the diſcipline of the church: and the clergy, by their declaration of 1682, have aſſerted the liberty of the Gallican church, the authority of general councils, and that the pope's judgment is not irreformable (meaning irreverſible) nor infallible, unleſs the conſent of the church go along with it: and they expreſsly condemn his pretended power over princes in temporal matters, to depoſe them directly or indirectly, or to abſolve the ſubjects of their allegiance: neither have they yet admitted the inquiſition; nor are they great favourers of the jeſuits: though it muſt be owned, that the nation in general have adhered to the church of Rome, and all its other errors and ſuperſtitions beſides. Upon the repeal of the above-mentioned edict by Lewis XIV. which toleration the Proteſtants had ſought ſeveral years to obtain, and was firſt granted them by his grand-father Henry IV. or Le Grand, a cruel perſecution enſued, by which above a hundred thouſand Reformed were forced to quit France: ſo that the Proteſtant refugees, ſetting up manufactories wherever they came, particularly in England and Holland, the demand for French merchandiſe has ſince been very conſiderably diminiſhed. The crown of France is hereditary only in the male line, to the excluſion of females, by the Salique law. And in the ſucceſſion of their royal families, there have been three upon the throne, namely, the Merovingian, Carlovinian, and Capetine branches, entirely diſtinct, and no other than ſucceſſive uſurpers upon one another. The preſent reigning family is that of Bourbon, which began in Henry of Navarre, ſurnamed Henry the Great, through a ſcene of bloodſhed, and the final cruſhing of the league. He was a Proteſtant when he aſcended the throne; but publickly renounced his religion, and profeſſed the Roman Catholic: but the jeſuits ſuſpecting his ſincerity, are ſaid to have hired Ravillac, by whom he was ſtabbed not long after. The ſtile of the eldeſt ſon of France is always Dauphine. The new acquiſitions and conqueſts of France within ſomething more than a century ago have been Alſace, very lately Lorrain, and Barboth, on the ſide of Germany; thoſe of Artois, Cambray, part of Flanders, Hainault, and Luxemburg, on the ſide of the Auſtrian Netherlands; Franche Comte, and Rouſſilon, a part of Catalonia, in Spain. Its higheſt mountains are the Pyrennees, the Alps, thoſe of Sevennes, Auvergne, &c. The moſt conſiderable ports of France, are in the Atlantic ocean, as Calais, Ambleteuſe, St. Valory, Dieppe, Havre-de-grace, St. Malo, Breſt, La Rochelle, Rochford, Bourdeaux, and Bayonne. Alſo in the Mediterranean ſea are Marſeilles Toulon. With regard to the eccleſiaſtical government of France, it is divided into eighteen archbiſhoprics; namely, Lyons, primate of Daul; Sens alſo ſtiles himſelf primate of the Gauls, Paris, Rheims, Rouen, Tours, Bourges, Alby, Bourdeaux, Auch, Toulouſe, Narbonne, Arles, Aix in Provence, Vienne in Dauphiny, Ambrun, Beſançon, and Cambray, beſides 109 biſhoprics, their reſpective ſuffragrans, ſixteen heads of religious orders, with an infinite number of monks and nuns, &c. all of them together conſtituting the moſt conſiderable of the three orders into which the French nation is divided.

GAB

G, The ſeventh letter of the Engliſh alphabet, and the fifth conſonant. Its form is borrowed from that of the Romans, who likewiſe formed it from the gamma of the Greeks, as may be eaſily perceived from conſulting the manuſcripts in that language, and by conſidering the form of the Gothic and Saxon capitals. The letter G is of the mute kind, and cannot be ſounded without a vowel; it has two ſounds, one of which is called hard, becauſe formed by a hard preſſure of the tongue againſt the upper gums; this ſound it retains before a, o, u, l, r, as gat, god, gull, gleſs, graſs. The other ſound, which is termed ſoft, reſembles the ſound of the J, and is commonly, though not always, found before e or i, as in gem and gibbet. Before n, at the end of a word, it is not ſounded, but ſerves only to lengthen the vowel, which comes before it, according to the French, from whence theſe words are derived, as condign, malign, which are pronounced condine, maline. It is often ſilent before b in the middle of words, as in might, which is ſounded mite: this ſeems to have been derived to us from the Saxons, who, as Dr. Hickes informs us, pronounced it in the beginning, middle and ending of words, like g y, as in gate, which ſome ruſtics ſtill pronounce yate; in dæg, which we pronounce day, and fægl, which we pronounce ſail.

GAY, Adj. [Fr.] briſk, nimble, chearful, or merry; fine, or ſhowy dreſs.

GAY [John] born in 1688, at or near Barnſtaple in Devonſhire; was educated at the free ſchool there, and deſcended of an ancient family. The family eſtate being impaired, he was bred to trade, as a means of improving his fortune, and put apprentice to a ſilk mercer in London; but that ſtation not ſuiting his inclination, he procured a releaſe from his apprenticeſhip on eaſy terms, and ſoon gave the public a proof of his talents in his rural Georgic. His friendſhip with Mr. Pope was perhaps no ſmall addition to his fame, eſpecially as it was in itſelf a tacit proof of his abilities, and gave riſe to his Paſtorals, which put his merits in a light that attracted general notice, and univerſal applauſe. The encouragement which his piece of the Beggars Opera met with at its firſt exhibition, and its popularity to this very day, contributes not a little to raiſe the idea we muſt have of him in the character of a poet. The chief virtues he was remarkable for, were honeſty and ſincerity. As a fabuliſt few equalled, and none can ſurpaſs him; there is ſuch an eaſy elegance in all his pieces of this kind, that he ſeems to have ſtolen the curioſa felicitas of Horace; in his paſtorals he is juſtly called the ſon of Spenſer, is as natural, but not ſo rough, as Theocritus, and both in his language and ſentiments ſeems to give us a more perfect idea of paſtoral poetry, than any definition can convey of it. As Swift ſays of him, he had the art of writing childiſh things without appearing puerile. Even in his fables, addreſſed to a prince, he ſpares no ſoible which might characterize a courtier; and if he recommends himſelf to princely favour, it is not under the character of a ſlave, but that of a man. It were to be wiſhed he had met with that encouragement his merits deſerved, or at leaſt that he had learnt the art of bearing a diſappointment. He died in 1732.

GERMAN'DER, S. [germandre, Fr.] in Botany, a plant, called in Latin, teucrium, from K. Teucer, who was the firſt that brought it into uſe.

GER'MANY, empire of, a very conſiderable country of large extent, and the ſcene of many great actions, whoſe affairs are interwoven with thoſe of every nation in Europe. It anciently extended northward as far as the Northern ocean; ſo that Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, were included; and ſouthward it was bounded by the Danube: ſo that Auſtria, Bavaria, Stiria, Carinthia, Carniola, &c. now reckoned part of it, were excluded, as well as Alſace, part of the Palatinate, and the ſpiritual electorates, the Rhine being reckoned by Ptolemy, and other ancient writers, the weſtern boundary. Theſe laſt, indeed, together with Lorrain and the neighbouring countries, were afterwards poſſeſſed by Germans; and being conquered by the Romans, were diſtinguiſhed by them into Germania Prima, and Germania Secunda: but Lorrain Alſace, &c. now belong to France. At preſent, Germany is bounded on the W. by the dominions of France and the Low-Countries, from which it is ſeparated by the rivers Rhine, Moſelle, and Maeſe; on the E. by Poland and Hungary, including Bohemia; on the N. by Denmark and the Baltic ſea; and on the S. by Switzerland, the dominions of the ſtate of Venice, and the Alps, which divide it from Italy. It lies between lat. 45 deg. 12 min. and 55 deg. N. and between long. 6 deg. and 19 deg. 45 min. being from N. to S. that is, from Strahlſund in Pomerania, to the frontiers of Carniola and Iſtria, 600 Engliſh miles; and in breadth, from the town of Spa in the W. to the confines of Poland in the E. about 500. It is ſaid to be three times and a half larger than England, a fifth bigger than France, and as large as Poland and Sweden. Germany is moſtly level towards the N. and E. the ſoil being a barren ſand, or marſhy. On the S. it is incumbered with the Alps; but in the midland is an intermixture of hills and dales, corn-fields and meadow-grounds, eſpecially on the banks of its rivers, namely, the Rhine, Danube, &c. where the air is alſo very temperate; but the northern parts are cold, and conſequently leſs fruitful. The ſeaſons are more conſtant and regular here than in the countries which confine on or lie in the ocean. In thoſe provinces next the ſea, and abounding with lakes and rivers, there is plenty of rain; in other parts are ſometimes conſiderable droughts. The N. wind from the Baltic and Sweden brings froſt and ſnow; the eaſtern blaſts, coming over a vaſt continent from China and Japan, bring dry unhealthy weather: but the S. W. wind, as with us, is the moſt frequent and ſalubrious that blows in Germany. In general this country and Poland are like Great Britain both in climate and ſoil. Beſides great plenty of corn, cattle, ſheep, wool, cloth, horſes, fiſh, &c. the earth affords alſo metals and minerals, as iron, bitumen, ochre, copper, tin, lead, and ſilver in ſome places, allum, vitriol, quickſilver, ſalt, coal, &c. Though in ſome parts hilly, it is no where mountainous, except towards the S. and S. W. where the Alps and ſome mountains in Alſace ſerve as bulwarks againſt Italy and France. The foreſts and waſtes yield plenty of wood for fuel and building, wild fowl, all ſorts of veniſon, &c. They alſo feed vaſt numbers of hogs, and the Ardenne foreſt good mutton. The rivers and lakes abound in variety of good fiſh. The orchards are full of common fruit-trees; and in the ſouthern provinces there is plenty of the more delicate ſort. They have rich wines, of which, particularly of Rheniſh and Moſelle, vaſt quantities are exported. The very mountains of the Alps, on the German ſide, are in many places cultivated to the top, and the valleys abound with paſtures and vineyards; ſo that no country has ſo great a variety of every thing conducive to the comforts of life; and would have ſtill more products, and in greater perfection, were there due encouragement for huſbandry, and their great men were not ſo exceſſively fond of foreign luxury, particularly wines; ſo that Germany exports leſs, and imports more, than any other country perhaps in the world. Though the wines in many parts of Germany are rich enough, others are ſmall and ſharp; and where no wines are, they have excellent beer. The trade of the cities on the Rhine and Moſelle conſiſts principally in wood, corn, wine, and oil: but the traffic of moſt of them have failed ſince the eſtabliſhment of the Dutch republic. The chief commodities which we have from them are linen, diaper, and damaſk, of which many thouſand ells are imported every week by the way of Hamburgh. They have alſo from us conſiderable quantities of buttons, buckles, ſciſſars, and the like trinkets, with which Nuremberg and Augſburg formerly ſupplied, not only Germany, but likewiſe England, and moſt other countries. Our watches, though the Germans are ſo famous for clock-work, and once ſolely in poſſeſſion of it, they prefer to their own. Several places of this country, that lay waſte formerly, are now improved by tillage, manufactures, and trade carried on by companies of French Proteſtants, who have ſettled here ſince the revocation of the edict of Nantz. Their rivers, particularly the Rhine, yield gold-duſt mixed with the ſand. The money of moſt nations in Europe is current here, and goes at a good value; the moſt common gold coin are Louis-d'ors and ducats. The rixdollar, which is true ſterling, is equal to 4s. 6d. Engliſh; a German florin is equal to our half-crown; a ſpecie crown anſwers to the Engliſh crown, but a crown current only to 3s. 6d. No country has ſuch a variety of coin, and that clipped and adulterated, as Germany; which is no ſmall diſadvantage to trade, and very ſenſibly ſinks

the value of land. Every circle in Germany has mines of vitriol and ſulphur, like coal-pits; but theſe are ſeldom above twenty fathom deep, and their copper-mines ſeldom above forty, the produce of which may be about 200,000 l. two thirds of which are exported unwrought. The tin-mines here are reckoned the beſt in the world, and thoſe of iron and lead inferior only to the Swediſh. Their iron is much better than the Engliſh, and near moſt of their mines are forges for caſting guns, &c. at which the Germans are very expert. In Germany, and but ſeldom any where elſe, is found that ſort of earth called terra ſigillata, or lemnia, as being brought from the iſle of Lemnos. It is a hard earth, with white, yellow, and red veins, ſaid to be an antidote againſt poiſons. In Bavaria, Tirol, Liege, &c. are good marble-quarries. And for all kinds of precious ſtones, this country ſurpaſſes moſt others in Europe. A remarkable natural curioſity, peculiar to Germany, is the ſchiefferſtein, a blackiſh glittering kind of ſtone, or ſalt, which melted and brayed, yields copper and ſome ſilver. No country in Europe, perhaps in the whole world, has ſo many noble rivers; the principal of which are the Danube, Rhine, Moſelle, Maeſe, Elb, Oder, Weſer, Aller, Maine, and Inn, &c. by all which an immenſe trade might be carried on, were the induſtry of the inhabitants equal to their natural advantages. With regard to ſalutary fountains and baths, there are not ſo many in all Europe as in Germany alone, there being no part of the country without them; ſo that they are reckoned to be about 1000 ſprings of acid waters only; ſome hot, ſome cold, and others that are both hot and cold at different times. Of the hot ſprings here are innumerable ſpecies; but of the very cold there are not many. Theſe ſpring from their mountains; and the beſt are thoſe at Pyrmont, great quantities of which waters are imported into England; alſo the medicinal waters at Baden, Aix-la-Chapelle, &c. The Germans claim the invention of printing; but this the Dutch conteſt with them: this however was found out in the year 1440. The invention of gunpowder is probably theirs, by friar Barthold Schwartz, a chemical preparation, mixed with ſaltpetre and brimſtone in a crucible, accidentally catching fire, gave him the hint. This happened about 1330; though ſome ſome of our Engliſh writers ſay, that friar Roger Bacon of Oxford invented it a hundred years before. They in general are allowed to be excellent mechanics and chemiſts: yet among the latter have aroſe ſeveral pretenders to the grand elixir or magiſtery; the falſity of whoſe claims to that diſcovery hath been often publickly detected: as among the former, ſeveral projectors have pretended to have found out the perpetual motion; but that has been found to be an impoſition alſo. They have brought clock-work, watches, ſwords, locks, and fire-arms, to a very great perfection. The manufactures of tin-plates, or that commonly called white-iron, they have entirely monopolized. They are reputed good painters, engravers, enamellers, chaiſers, or relievo-figure workers, and engineers. Their foreign trade they carry on by the rivers above-mentioned, and the Baltic, more particularly from Hamburgh, Lubeck, Bremen, Stetin, &c. and by land with Italy, Switzerland, France, and Holland. The Germans in general are warlike, robuſt, hardy, and brave, well-ſhaped, tall, and ſturdy; and both gentry and commonalty are very fond of the army. Their country is often the ſeat of war, as at preſent in 1761, the men covering the face of it like legions of locuſts, in the numerous bodies and combined ſtrength of the empire, France, Auſtria, Sweden, Ruſſia, &c. againſt the king of Pruſſia and his allies of England, Hanover, Heſſe, Brunſwic, &c. The clergy are generally good ſcholars, ſolemn preachers, and ſolid writers, particularly in morality or divinity, though ſometimes too prolix; aud they are affable to ſtrangers.

GERME, S. [Fr. germen, Lat.] a ſprout or ſhoot; that part which grows and ſpreads, "Made out of the germe or treadle of the "egg." Brown. In Botany, that part of a flower or plant which contains the ſeed.

GI'BRALTAR, S. a famous ſea-port and fortreſs of Andaluſia, in Spain, at the mouth of the Streights of its name, lying between the Atlantic ocean, and the Mediterranean ſea. The Moors call it Gebel-Tarif, that is, the mount of Tarif, a mooriſh general, who about the eighth century landed here, with three African princes, in order to conquer Spain; from which its preſent name ſeems compounded. It is the Calpe or Calpia of the ancients, as being ſituated at the foot of the famous mountain of that name, the weſtern boundary of the earth, or the place where Hercules put up one of his pillars, and ſixteen miles N. of Avila or Ceuta, the other, on the oppoſite ſhore of Africa. The town of Gibraltar is neither large nor beautiful; yet on account of its fortifications is reckoned the key of Spain; and is furniſhed with the neceſſary artillery for its defence. It is built upon a rock, in a peninſula, to which, on the land-ſide, is only a narrow paſſage between the rock and the ſea, but that walled, and fortified both by art and nature, being there ſo incloſed by high ſteep hills, as to be almoſt inacceſſible that way. It hath but two gates on that ſide, and as many towards the ſea. Acroſs this iſthmus the Spaniards have drawn a fortified line, in order to prevent the garriſon of Gibraltar from having any intercourſe with the country: yet they carry on a clandeſtine trade. Its harbour is formed by a bulwark properly fortified. In July 1704, the confederate fleet of the Engliſh and Dutch, under the command of Sir George Rooke, after bombarding the town for two days, obliged the marquis de Salines, who was then the governor, to ſurrender. The Spaniards attempted its recovery that ſame year, when it ſtood out a memorable ſiege under the prince of Heſſe Darmſtadt. Upon which occaſion about 4 or 500 of the enemy having in the night crept up the rock which covers the town, were driven down headlong next morning. The Spaniards finding that neither ſieges nor negotiations availed any thing, ceded it to Great Britain by the treaty of Utrecht in 1713. They again made an attempt in 1727; but were obliged to raiſe the ſiege, after lying before it ſeveral months. At this time they attempted to blow up the rock, but found it impracticable; and to this day it continues in the poſſeſſion of the Engliſh. Since that time it has been more ſtrongly fortified, new works and improvements being daily added to it; ſo that the place is rendered impregnable by any other means, than treachery or ſurpriſe (for ſtarved it cannot be, whilſt our fleet can ſupply it). Hence the Spaniards only become ridiculous in attempting it by formal ſieges. Here are people of all nations, as Turks, Jews, and Moors. The garriſon is confined within very narrow limits, the ground of which produces hardly any thing; ſo that all their proviſions are brought them, either from England, or from Ceuta on the Barbary coaſt. The road of Gibraltar is neither ſafe againſt an enemy nor ſtorms, and is not convenient for refitting of veſſels, though they may be laid on their ſides for careening. The ſtreights are twenty-four miles long, and about fifteen broad; through which ſets a current from the Atlantic ocean into the Mediterranean, and for the ſtemming of it, a briſk gale is required. Since ſeveral notorious oppreſſions have been committed by our military governors of Gibraltar, who uſed to exact, and do what they pleaſed, the parliament, after a narrow inſpection into the affair, have erected the town into a body corporate, the civil power being now lodged in its magiſtrates. It lies forty miles S. W. of Cadiz, and eighty S. of Seville. Lat. 36 deg. 21 min. N. long. 6 deg. 15 min. W.

GLA'MORGANSHIRE, S. one of the counties of South Wales. It lies partly in the dioceſe of St. David's, and partly in that of Llandaff, and is a maritime county, having the Severn ſea, or Briſtol channel, on the S. Monmouthſhire on the E. Carmarthenſhire on the W. and Brecknockſhire on the N. It is probably enough conjectured, to have formerly belonged to ſome prince or abbey of the name of Morgan: others derive it from Mor or Muir, ſignifying the ſea, as it lies along that of the Severn. Templeman reckons its length forty-five miles, and breadth twenty-one. Others make its dimenſions ſomething greater. It is divided into ten hundreds, as many market-towns, and eighteen pariſhes, in which are reckoned ſixteen rivers, and about 58,000 inhabitants. The air on the N. ſide, where it is mountainous, is ſharp, from the long continuance of the ſnow; but on the S. ſide it is mild; the country being more level, more populous, and bearing large crops of corn, and very ſweet graſs. Sheep and cattle abound in all parts of it, there being fruitful valleys among the mountains that yield very good paſture. Its other commodities are lead, coals, fiſh, and butter. The principal rivers are the Rhymny or Remny, the Taffe, the Ogmore, the Avon, the Cledaugh, and the Tave. Formerly this ſhire was fortified with abundance of caſtles, moſt of which have long ſince fallen to decay. It ſends but two members to parliament; namely, a knight of the ſhire, and a burgeſs for the town of Caerdiff. This county begins South Wales, which extends itſelf from the mouth of the Avon weſtward, to the Biſhop and his Clerks, rocks ſo called, which lie off St. David's in Pembrokeſhire; and from thence runs north to Aberdovy. On its coaſt are ſeveral ſmall harbours and ports, principally for ſhipping off their coals and proviſions; both which are exported in great quantities; the firſt to all the coaſts of Devonſhire, Somerſetſhire, and Cornwall, and ſome to Ireland; and the ſecond article they ſend to Briſtol, particularly butter, ſalted and barrelled up, as that of Suffolk and Yorkſhire is ſent to London.

GLO'CESTER, or GLOU'CESTER, S. by the Britons called Caer-glow, i. e. fine city, and anciently by the Romans Glevum, a large, well-built and healthy place, the capital of the county of its name. It was fortified; but after the reſtoration diſmantled by act of parliament, on account of the obſtinate reſiſtance it made againſt the forces of king Charles I. It ſtands on the Severn, over which river is a large ſtone bridge, the firſt next the ſea. It abounds with croſſes and ſtatues of the kings of England. The old houſes projecting into the ſtreets, and its croſs, having been pulled down by act of parliament, in 1750, inſtead of the latter is a ſtatue of colonel Selwyn, their member, who at his own expence made a very large reſervoir about half a mile off, through the trunk of which the water is brought into a ſquare baſon at its feet, and from thence conveyed into four canals, one paſſing through each of the four great ſtreets that here interſect at right angles, and is the center of the city. But draughts by Mr. Rickets have been made of the curious pieces of antiquity in the aforeſaid croſs, by order of the ſociety of antiquarians in London. To the vaſt number of churches and religious foundations in this city, alludes the proverb, "As ſure as God is at Glouceſter." This is the ſee of a biſhop, whoſe cathedral is a venerable pile, with a handſome tower, and finely vaulted choir. On the N. ſide lies the unfortunate king Edward II. Before the high altar, in the middle of the church, lies the equally unfortunate prince Robert, eldeſt ſon of William the Conqueror, after a miſerable life, and impriſonment of twenty-ſix years, by his brother William Rufus, in the caſtle of Caerdiff. Here is a whiſpering place, like the gallery in the cupola of St. Paul's, London. The cloiſters are very beautiful, and in the ſtyle of the chapel in King's college, Cambridge. In the city are large remains of abbeys, both of black and white friars. The famous Strongbow, who ſubdued Ireland, lies in the chapter-houſe. It is governed by a mayor, and has alſo a high ſteward, &c. Here are twelve companies, the maſters of which attend the mayor on all public occaſions, in their gowns, and with ſtreamers. It has a large quay and wharf on the river, and a cuſtom-houſe. The firſt proteſtant biſhop, Dr. John Hooper, was burnt in the cemitiry of his own cathedral, in the reign of queen Mary. At Glouceſter is great proviſion for the poor, particularly Bartholomew's hoſpital, for fifty-four men and women, with a miniſter, phyſician, and ſurgeon: a Blue-coat hoſpital, to which Sir Robert Rich, a native, gave 6000 l. for educating twenty boys, and for maintaining and cloathing annually ten men and women. Beſides theſe and three more, there are ſeveral benefactions for encouraging young tradeſmen, and putting out boys apprentices. And here an infirmary has been lately erected. A mile or two off is Robin Hood's hill, both a pleaſant walk for the citizens, and from which the town is ſupplied with water; and not far off, at Laſſington, are found the aſtroites or ſtar-ſtones, about the breadth of a ſilver penny, and thickneſs of a half crown, finely engraved by nature on the flat ſide. By this city, the Rickning way runs from the Severn's mouth into Yorkſhire. Glouceſter has given titles of Earl and Duke to ſeveral of the royal family: the laſt duke was queen Anne's ſon, who died in his minority. Juſt by is the little iſle of Alney, famous for the ſingle combat fought in it, between Edmund Ironſide, and Canute the Dane. Its weekly markets are on Wedneſday and Saturday, and annual fairs April 5, where is a great vent for cheeſe; July 5, September 28, and November 28, for cattle and horſes. It ſends two members to parliament, and lies ninety-four miles from London.

GLO'CESTERSHIRE, or GLO'UCESTERSHIRE, S. an inland county of England. It is bounded on the E. by Warwickſhire, Oxfordſhire, and Berkſhire; on the S. by Somerſetſhire and Wiltſhire, on the N. by Worceſterſhire, and on the W. by Hereford ſhire and Monmouthſhire. Templeman makes it ſixty-two miles in length, and thirty-ſix in breadth; though others reckon its dimenſions leſs. It contains one city, namely, that of its name, twenty-ſeven market-towns, and 280 pariſhes. The number of its inhabitants amounts to 162,568, who are repreſented by two knights of the ſhire, and two each for the city of Glouceſter, the boroughs of Cirenceſter and Tewkſbury. It is watered by ſeveral large rivers, as the Severn, the Wye, the Avon, the Iſis, the Leden, the Frome, the Stroude, the Windruſh, and other ſmaller ſtreams. The air of this country is healthy throughout; but has a difference of ſoil, the eaſtern parts being hilly; the weſtern woody; but the middle enriched with a pleaſant and fruitful valley; which laſt is much indented by the Severn, waſhing this country for forty miles together (ſeventy, including its windings); ſo that it brings neceſſaries from abroad, and gives the means of conveying the native commodities into foreign parts. This river in ſome places is two or three miles broad, and comes in with a tide called the boar; which rolls with a head from two to four feet high, carrying every thing before it, and overflowing its banks. It is remarked, that the tides in it are largeſt one year at full moon, and next at the change; and likewiſe one year the night-tides are higheſt, and another thoſe of the day. It abounds with all ſorts of grain, cattle, fowl, and game, with every thing that other counties produce, and as good in their kind; eſpecially bacon and cyder. And its rivers abound with fiſh; as ſalmon in the Severn, together with lampreys and conger-eels.

GUER'NSEY, S. Antoninus's Sarnia, an iſland in the county of Hampſhire, twenty-two miles N. W. of Jerſey, on the coaſt of Normandy, in France, and in the Engliſh channel. It runs from E. to W, in the form of a harp. Its N. ſide is low, and S. ſide high, being ſurrounded by ſteep rocks, a kind of natural defence to the iſland. It is thirteen miles and a half from S. W. to N. E. and twelve and a half, where broadeſt, E. and W. It contains ten (twelve) pariſhes. Its air is very healthful, as appears from the longevity of its inhabitants; and its ſoil of the ſame nature with that of Crete, or Ireland, where no venomous creature will live. It is naturally more fertile than Jerſey; but does not yield ſo much, the inhabitants neglecting its culture for the ſake of commerce. They have, however, a ſufficiency of corn and cattle for their own conſumption, and the uſe of their ſhipping. It abounds in fiſh: and in the N. W. part of the iſland, there is a lake about a mile in circuit, well ſtocked with the beſt and largeſt carp. Among the rocks on its coaſt, is one called Smyris, where are found hard, ſharp ſtones called emerils, which are uſed by lapidaries for cutting of diamonds, and by glaziers for cutting their glaſs. Its trade is more conſiderable than that of Jerſy, having a commodious pier on the E. ſide, near the town of St. Peter le Port, with two caſtles for its defence: ſo that there is a greater reſort of merchants to it than to the other. On the S. ſide, the ſhore falls in like a half moon, forming a bay, which is capable of receiving very large ſhips. This iſland is well ſituated for anneying the French in time of war; and they fit out ſome privateers to cruize upon them. It was anciently part of Normandy, in France; and ſome of the remains of the conqueror's eſtates is ſtill governed by the laws of that province, and its natives ſpeak French, though ſubject ever ſince, with very little interruption, to the crown of England. This iſland has a peculiar flower, called Lilium Sarnienſe; the leaves of which are covered with ſpangles like gold-duſt. It is full of gardens and orchards; and cyder is the common drink of the meaner people, while the other ſort have French wine, almoſt as cheap as beer is in England. The whole iſland is parcelled out into particular incloſures by hedges, &c. which they look upon not only as an improvement, but a ſecurity againſt any invader. Here is no fuel but the ſea-weed, called vraie, and coals from England or Wales. It gives title of baron to the earl of Aylesford. Here a very barbarous ſcene was acted in queen Mary's reign; a mother and her two daughters, the mother being alſo big with child, were burnt at a ſtake for Proteſtantiſm, in purſuance of the ſentence of the Dean (one Jaques Amy) and the clergy of the iſland. Guernſey is not ſo well wooded as Jerſey, nor ſo populous; their trained-bands not muſtering above 1200. The poſition of the S. and N. coaſt of Guernſey is quite contrary to that of Jerſey; and conſequently this cauſes a difference in the ſoil and air of both. The Geneva diſcipline was for a good while their rule in church matters: but now the liturgy of the church of England is ſo univerſally received in all the iſlands, namely, Guernſey, Jerſey, Alderney, and Sark, that there is not, it is ſaid, one congregation of Proteſtant diſſenters in them. It lies about twenty-four miles W. of Cape la Hogue, in Normandy, and ſixty S. of Portland, in Dorſetſhire.

H

H, The eighth letter of the alphabet, and ſixth of the conſonants; though by the Latins and modern Greeks eſteemed only as an aſpirate, yet whether it be a letter or no, may eaſily be determined by conſidering that it is a motion or effort of the larynx to modify the ſound of the vowel that follows it, as in heaven, health, hero, where the e is differently modified or ſounded from what it is in the words eating, endive, and elect, and as ſuch has the property of a conſonant. If it be not a letter, ſ and z are none, they being no more than hiſſing aſpirations, and they who exclude H from the number of letters as being only a mark of aſpiration, may for the ſame reaſon exclude the ſ and z, and the b and p likewiſe, by ſaying that they are only marks of certain motions of the lips. Its form, which in the capital is the ſame in the Roman and Saxon alphabets ſeems to be derived from the Phenician ח, with the mark in the middle inſtead of the top. The ſecretary capital ſeems to have been borrowed from the Saxon capital, as our ſmall b ſeems derived from the Gothic. In Engliſh, it is ſcarcely ever mute in the beginning of a word, eſpecially where it precedes a vowel; when it is followed by a conſonant it has no ſound, as in ſight; when it has c before it, it is ſometimes dropped, the c being pronounced hard like a k, as in Chriſt, which the Saxons wrote Criſt, and in echo; but this does not hold good always, for it is pronounced ſomewhat like the Hebrew ש, ſchin, in charity, cherub, &c. Among the ancients it was a numeral letter, ſignifying 200, and when with a mark over it thus H 2000. In abbreviatures it is uſed for homo, as J. H. S. Jeſus hominum Salvator, i. e. Jeſus the Saviour of mankind!

HA, Interj. an expreſſion of wonder or ſurprize. When repeated, an expreſſion of laughter, or joy. "He ſaith among the trumpets, ha, "ha." Job. xxxix. 25.

HART, S. [heort, Sax. hiort, Dan. hert, Belg.] a male of the deer kind, the female of which is a hind, or roe.

HA'RTFORD, and not HE'RTFORD, if its origin be derived from a hart, the arms of the place, deer being formerly very numerous in this part of the country. It is the ſhire-town of the county, and hundred of the ſame name, in England. In the time of the ancient Britons it was called Duro-cobrivæ, i. e. a red ford, from the red gravel at the ford juſt by, upon the river Lea or Lee. It is a very ancient place, and governed by a mayor, who returns two repreſentatives to parliament. The Eaſt-Saxon kings frequently kept their courts here; and in 673 a ſynod was held here, at which two kings of the heptarchy were preſent, the archbiſhop of Canterbury preſiding. In the twenty-fifth of queen Elizabeth Michaelmas term was kept here, on account of a plague in London, and that the queen ſometimes reſided in its caſtle. It had anciently a monaſtery of Benedictines, founded by the Conqueror's nephew Lupus, and had five churches, now reduced to two; namely, All-Saints, and St. Andrew's: the former, on the S. ſide of the town, has a tall ſpire covered with lead, and has eight good bells, beſides an organ, and handſome gallery. Here is a ſeat for the mayor and aldermen, and for the governors of Chriſt-church hoſpital in London, who have erected a fair-houſe in the town for the reception of ſome of their children; alſo a large gallery near the belfrey for their accommodation at church. St. Andrew's is only remarkable for giving name to the adjacent ſtreet. Hartford ſtands in a ſweet air, and dry vale, conſequently is very healthy, being built in the form of a capital Y, and the caſtle placed between the two horns of it, belonging to the deſcendants of Sir William Cowper, ſince king Charles I. Its weekly market is on Saturday. Its annual fairs are Saturday-fortnight before Eaſter, May 12, July 5, and November 8, for horſes and other cattle. Hartford lies 23 miles from London.

HA'RTFORDSHIRE, a county of England, bounded to the E. by Eſſex, to the S. by Middleſex, to the N. by Cambridgeſhire and Bedfordſhire, and to the W. by Buckinghamſhire. It is about twenty-four miles where broadeſt; namely, from Royſton in the N. to Totteridge in the S. and thirty where longeſt, from Putnam in the W. to Cheſton-nunnery in the E. It is much indented by the neighbouring counties. In Hartfordſhire are 18 market-towns, 120 pariſhes, about 451,000 acres, and above 95,000 inhabitants; who ſend to parliament two knights for the ſhire, and two members for Hartford-town, and two more for St. Alban's. The ſoil is moſt generally barren, compared with other ſhires; and with regard to deep-feedings, or ſheep paſtures, there are but few, and thoſe eſpecially about Knebworth. Yet it muſt be owned, that ſince the great improvement of huſbandry by clover, cinque-foin, and other herbage, by manure, marl, ſoot, &c. this county has been rendered very fertile. The parts about Hitchin are clayiſh, but not ſo rich as that to be met with in the weſtern counties of the ſame ſoil. The reſt is moſtly a chalky earth. The paſtures, where dry, produce fern and broom; and where wet, ruſhes, moſs, and buſhes: but by a modern invention, called buſh-draining, the wet lands are greatly improved, by draining off the ſtagnant rain-water on the clayiſh ſurface, which chilled the roots of the corn.

HA'RTSHORN, S. in Medicine, the horn of a hart, called the red deer. Its ſalt is uſed as a ſudorific, its ſpirit has all the virtues of volatile alkalies, and they are both uſed for bringing people out of fits, by being applied to the noſe. The raſpings are, by boiling in water, formed into jellies, for conſumptive people, and the bone, being calcined and powdered, is uſed to abſorb acidities in the ſtomach, and uſed as drink when boiled in water in diarrhœas.

HE'REFORD, [i. e. in Saxon, the Ford of the Army, as being the head-quarters of the Saxons before the conqueſt, and of the Engliſh after] the metropolis and only city of the ſhire of its name: though large, it is not populous, is an antique place, and lies low, on the banks of the Wye, which ſometimes overflows the ſtreets; ſo that they are very dirty. Its flouriſhing ſtate it originally owed to the martyrdom of Ethelbert, king of the Eaſt Angles, who was baſely murdered by king Offa, and had a church built here to his memory, ſoon after erected into an epiſcopal ſee, and held in high veneration by the Weſt Saxons and Mercian kings. This is a ſtately fabric, the ſpire handſome, but not high; with a fine tower at the weſt end. The choir, though plain, is neat; and it has a very good organ. Here are great numbers of monuments of biſhops, &c. The chapter-houſe, which was very beautiful, was deſtroyed in the civil wars. Between the cathedral and the palace is a venerable pile, built and roofed with ſtone, conſiſting of two chapels, St. Magdalen, and St. Catherine, the one over the other. The city is governed by a mayor, who returns two members to parliament. It has particular privileges for its ſeveral companies, who have diſtinct halls. The aſſizes, &c. are holden here. It has an hoſpital liberally endowed, for twelve poor perſons; with two charity ſchools; one for ſixty boys, and the other for forty girls; all taught and cloathed by ſubſcription. Its weekly markets are on Wedneſday, Friday, and Saturday; and its annual fairs are Tueſday after Candlemas-day, (February 2) for horned cattle, horſes, and hops; Wedneſday in Eaſter-week, for horned cattle and horſes; May 19, a pleaſure fair, and for toys; July 1, for horned cattle and wool; October 20, for horned cattle, cheeſe, and Welch butter.

HE'REFORDSHIRE, a county of England, bounded on the E. by Glouceſterſhire, on the S. by Monmouthſhire, on the W. by Brecknockſhire and Radnorſhire, and on the N. by Worceſterſhire and Shropſhire. It is nearly circular, containing thirty-five miles from N. to S. thirty from E. to W. In it are one city, eight market-towns, 176 pariſhes, two foreſts, eight parks, about 95,600 inhabitants, and ſends two members to parliament for the county, with two each for Hereford, Lempſter, and Weobly. The air here is generally reckoned good; and to ſhew how healthy and long-lived the inhabitants are, ſerjeant Hoſkins, at a progreſs of king James I. into theſe parts, procured ten old men and women to dance the maurice before him, whoſe ages put together made above a thouſand. And in this country the pleaſantneſs and ſalubrity of the tract, particularly between the Severn and Wye, have become proverbial. The ſoil of this country is very fruitful. It abounds in good corn and paſture, with wool, water, and wood. The bread and wool of Lempſter are equally famous; alſo the wool of Wigmore and the Golden-vale on the Duffrin-dore, is as fine as any in England, that of the South-downs not excepted. Cyder, which is the common drink of the country, is both good and cheap, having been reckoned the beſt in England, till the rough has been preferred to the ſoft, ſince which the Southam cyder of Devonſhire carries it.

HO'TTENTOTS, S. country of the, a ſubdiviſion of Caffreria, and the moſt ſouthern land of all Africa, comprehending the Cape of Good Hope and the other Dutch ſettlements there. It is bounded on the N. W. by part of the river Bravaghul; on the N. it extends to the tropic of Capricorn; on the N. E. the river of the Holy Ghoſt parts it from the empire of Monomotapa. It has the eaſtern ocean on the E. and S. and the Ethiopic ocean on the W. lying between lat. 25 and 35 deg. S. and between long. 15 and 35 deg. E. The appellation of Hottentot is not a nick-name, but an original and national name, by which they have always diſtinguiſhed themſelves. Thoſe are a different ſort of people from the Cafres: they indeed reſemble one another in their woolly hair, large lips, and flat noſes: the latter circumſtance is artificial; for as ſoon as a Hottentot woman is delivered of a child, ſhe breaks down the bridge of its noſe with one of her thumbs. Beſides, the Cafres are black and ſhining; whereas the Hottentots are of a dingy olive-colour. They alſo differ in their ways of living. Of the Hottentots there are about twenty different nations. Their country, though mountainous, is very fertile; being principally cultivated by the Dutch, and its productions very plentiful, and in the greateſt perfection, particularly at the Cape; by touching at which harbour, a kind of half-way houſe in outward and homeward bound voyages to and from the Eaſt Indies, the lives of many thouſands, almoſt rotten with the ſcurvy, are ſaved, by means of the freſh proviſions, eſpecially vegetables, to be eaſily procured here. The natives live chiefly upon grazing of cattle, hunting, and fiſhing. The Dutch allow them their own laws and cuſtoms; but oblige them to furniſh their ſettlements with cattle, and aſſiſt them in their huſbandry, &c. for which labour they receive in return proviſions, brandy, tobacco, &c. The men are of a moderate ſtature, the women ſmall and black, reſembling the negroes; but not naturally of ſo black a complexion, which they take a great deal of pains to heighten by a mixture of greaſe and ſoot. Before the Dutch had introduced ſtrong liquors among them, of which they now are very fond, they drank only milk and water, or butter-milk. The Hottentots are not ſo ſtupid and inhuman as they have been repreſented. They learn the Dutch, French, and Portugueſe tongues, ſo as to expreſs themſelves in them. In agriculture, though they practiſe none for themſelves, they excel all the Europeans reſiding among them: and in many other arts they diſcover good marks of capacity, could they be perſuaded to make a right uſe of it. They make excellent ſervants, and perhaps the moſt faithful in the world, not diminiſhing the leaſt article committed to their truſt; but then they are the lazieſt wretches under the ſun, placing their whole earthly happineſs in ſloth. They can think, and to purpoſe too, if they pleaſe; but they hate the trouble of it. If a Hottentot is not rouzed by any preſent appetite or neceſſity, he is as deaf to employment as a log: but when either urges him, he is all activity; after which he retires to enjoy again his beloved idleneſs. It is to this general lazineſs of the Hottentots we muſt aſcribe that part of their character, that in the matter of diet they are the filthieſt people in the world, but not ſo ravenous and uncleanly as they are generally repreſented; though, after all, they make an European abhor victuals. By their manner of dreſſing their food they ſeem to ſuffer nothing, either in health or length of days, moſt of them living to a great age, eſpecially where intemperance does not ſhorten their lives. What makes them ſtill a naſtier generation, is, the cuſtom of well-beſmearing their bodies and apparel, which is only a ſkin over their ſhoulders, with butter or ſheep's fat mixed with ſoot, and that paint is of greater or leſs ſweetneſs according to the ability of the perſon uſing it: and is ſometimes ſo rank, that it may be ſmelt at a conſiderable diſtance. The face and fore-part of the neck of a Hottentot man are always uncovered. About his neck hangs a little greaſy bag, in which he carries his knife, pipe, &c. Their cloaks, or kroſſes, as they call them, cover the trunks of their bodies; and are worn open or cloſe, according to the ſeaſon. They lie upon them at night, and when they die are tied up and interred in them. They generally wear three rings of ivory upon their left arms; and theſe they finiſh with exquiſite art, ſerving as guards when engaged with an enemy. The women generally wear two kroſſes; a leſſer under a greater, and alſo open like thoſe of the men. And both ſexes have a modeſty-piece tacked to their mantles. Girls, from their infancy till about twelve years of age, wear bulruſhes tied in rings about their legs, from their knees down to their ankles; and then theſe are changed for rings made of narrow ſlips of ſheep or calf-ſkin; and theſe are worn to guard their legs from thorns and briars, as they go every day into the fields to gather roots and other things for food: in the next place they are one great diſtinction of the ſex, and reckoned very ornamental: and laſtly, they are proviſions againſt an hour of hunger and ſcarcity; which they bruiſe between two ſtones, and then devour with a great deal of ſatisfaction. They are kept from falling upon the women's heels by large wrappers of ruſhes or leather about their ankles. Both ſexes among the Hottentots are very fond of any ornament for the head, as braſs buttons, thin plates of that metal, bits of looking-glaſs, &c. They alſo wear earrings and beads of braſs or glaſs; the latter in their necklaces, bracelets, and girdles. The men diſtinguiſh themſelves by the bladders of the wild beaſts they have killed, blowing them up and faſtening them to their hair; and theſe they ever after wear as trophies of their atchievements.

HUNG, preter and part. paſſ. of Hang.

HU'NGARY, kingdom of, in Europe, is by the Turks called Magiar, by the Sclavonians Wergierſka, by the Germans Ungern and Hungerland, and by the Italians Ungharia. It has its name of Hungary from the Huns, a Scythian or Tartar nation, who poſſeſſed themſelves of this part of the country, when the whole was over-run by the barbarous northern nations, upon the decline of the Roman empire. It lies between lat. 45 and 49 deg. N. and between long. 16 and 25 deg. E. In its ſtate of proſperity, and when taken in a larger ſenſe, it included the provinces of Tranſylvania, even the Moldaw and Walachia, Moldavia, Sclavonia, Croatia, Dalmatia, Boſnia, Servia, and others of leſs note, which were all ſubject to it; and is the Lower Pannonia of the Romans. But when taken in a more limited ſenſe, it is bounded on the S. by the river Drave, or Draw, which divides it from Sclavonia; to the E. by Servia; on the N. by Walachia, Tranſylvania, and the Carpathian mountains, the laſt ſeparating it from Poland; to the W. by Moravia, Auſtria, and Stiria. Its dimenſions are variouſly given. Moll ſays, that Hungary is 240 miles long, and 235 broad. It is divided into Upper and Lower Hungary: the Upper being that part beyond the Danube, towards Poland, Tranſylvania; and the Lower on the S. W. ſide of the ſame river. The northern part of Hungary is mountainous and barren; but the S. part is one continued plain of about 300 miles from Preſburg, the capital, to Belgrade, being extremely fruitful, but abounding in moraſſes. Its moſt conſiderable mountains are the Crapack or Carpathian, the general name for all thoſe hills that ſeparate this kingdom from Poland, Moravia, Silefia, and ſome part of Auſtria; though the people that live near them call them by different names. Beſides theſe, there are very few mountains or woods. In them are mines of gold, ſilver, copper, iron, vitriol, ſulphur, and pits of ſalt. No ſoil can be more fruitful, producing corn in ſuch abundance, that it is ſaid to be ſix times as cheap as in England; though generally much inferior to ours both in body and in quality.

HU'NGER, [Sax. honger, Belg.] the pain felt on faſting long; a deſire of food. Figuratively, any violent deſire.

To HUNGER, V. N. to feel a pain on long faſting; to be deſirous of eating. Figuratively, to deſire any thing with great eagerneſs.

HU'NTINGDON, anciently HU'NTERSDUNE or DOWN, a populous trading town, and the capital of the county of its name. It ſtands on a ſmall eminence, upon the N. ſide of the river Ouſe, over which is a free-ſtone bridge, and near it was formerly a caſtle, which, with the borough, formerly belonged to David king of Scots, which king Stephen granted him; but the caſtle was demoliſhed by king Henry II. in order to put an end to the competition about this earldom between the Scottiſh kings and the family of St. Liz: yet the former ſtill claimed it. This town is a great thoroughfare on the N. road, and full of very good inns. It is a ſtrong p ſs on the Ouſe, and in the civil wars both parties thought it ſo. This is the conſtant place for the aſſizes, as well as the county-gaol; but conſiſts principally of one long ſtreet, which is pretty well built, with a handſome market-place. It is governed by a mayor, who returns two repreſentatives to parliament. Here is a good grammar-ſchool; and one Mr. Richard Fiſhbourne, of London, gave 2000 l. to the town for charitable uſes. It had anciently fifteen churches, among which was an abbey built by the empreſs Maud. In latter times it had but four, and in the civil wars theſe were reduced to two.

HU'NTINGDONSHIRE, one of the counties of England, ſo called from the ſhire-town, on account of the conveniency of hunting in it, being formerly one entire foreſt, till diſforeſted by Henry II. and III. and Edward I. the latter leaving no more foreſt in it than what was his own ground. On the W. and N. it is bounded by Northamptonſhire, being parted on the latter boundary by the river Avon or Nen. It has Bedfordſhire on the S. and Cambridgeſhire on the E. from which laſt it is moſtly divided by the Ouſe. It is not above twenty-five miles long, nor twenty broad. In this compaſs it contains four hundreds, ſix market-towns, ſeventy-nine pariſhes, two principal rivers, namely the Ouſe and the Nen, five bridges, 240,000 acres, and about 50,000 inhabitants. In the low-lands are ſo many meers or lakes, and fens, beſides ſmaller ſtreams, that the air in general is neither pleaſant nor ſalubrious: for though the fogs and exhalations ariſing from theſe are not ſo unwholſome as thoſe of the ſtagnated ſalt water in Eſſex, Kent, Suſſex, &c. yet they are always damp, and often noxious, eſpecially to ſtrangers; though moſt of the inhabitants are healthy, and many of them long-lived.

I, Is the ninth letter of the English alphabet, considered both as a vowel and a consonant, and agreeable to that difference is written or printed in a different form, the consonant being produced below the line thus J; but the vowel standing even with the other letters. The consonant is called a jod, which is the name by which the Hebrew י is called: in some words it is sounded like a soft g, as in Jew, jeſt. The I vowel has two sounds, 1st long, which is generally noted by an e final, as in wine; 2dly short, as in thin. When placed before e, it makes a dipthong of the same sound as a double e, as in field, pronounced feeld. After o it makes a mingled sound composed of that of the two vowels, as in coil, coin. In abbreviatures, it stands for the name of Jesus, and was formerly a numeral letter signifying 101, but at present is used to denote an unit or one.

I, Pronoun personal [of it, Goth. ic, Sax. or ich, Belg.] used by a person when speaking of, or ascribing an action to, himself. Sometimes it is used instead of ay, yea, or yes; from ia, Sax. "I, Sir, she took them, and read them "in my presence." Shak.

JA'MAICA, S. one of the Greater Antilles of the Weſt Indies, and in the Atlantic ocean, in North America. This iſland having been diſcovered in 1493, by Columbus, in his ſecond voyage to the Weſt Indies, he changed the name Jamaica to St. Jago, which it retained while in the hands of the Spaniards for 150 years, during which time they deſtroyed moſt of the natives; but after they were diſpoſſeſſed by the Engliſh, it recovered its old appellation. It lies between lat. 17 and nearly 19 deg. N. and between long. 76 and 79 deg. W. It is in length from E. to W. 140 Engliſh miles, and about 60 in breadth from N. to S. Its form is oval. This country is interſected from E. to W. with a ridge of lofty mountains, rugged and rocky, which are called the blue mountains; on each ſide of theſe are chains of ſmaller mountains gradually lower. The larger mountains are little better than ſo many rocks; and where there is any earth, it is only a ſtubborn clay. The mountains are very ſteep, and the rocks tumbled upon one another ſtupenduouſly, occaſioned by the frequent earthquakes which have ſhaken this iſland in all times; yet bare of earth as they are, they are all covered to the very top with a great variety of beautiful trees, flouriſhing as it were in a perpetual ſpring, from the rains frequently falling, and the miſts perpetually brooding upon them. The rocks are the parents of about 100 fine rivulets, which tumble down their ſides in cataracts, forming amidſt the precipices and verdure of the trees, a wildly pleaſing imagery, and carrying down with its torrent ſtones and timber: but none of them are navigable. This iſland is of great importance to the crown of Great Britain, not only for its trade, but for its ſite in the very heart of the Spaniſh acquiſitions in America: ſo that no veſſel can come to or go from the continent, but muſt neceſſarily ſail within ſight of Jamaica. It abounds with ſeveral fine bays, which are convenient and ſafe for any number of ſhipping.

JE'RSEY, S. one of the iſlands and old remains of the duchy of Normandy, in France, belonging ever ſince the conqueſt to the Engliſh crown. It lies in the Engliſh channel, pretty near the coaſt of France. This, with the other iſles of Guernſey, Alderney, and Sarke, from being members of the biſhopric of Coutance, in Normandy, were transferred from that dioceſe to Wincheſter by the pope's bull in 1499, and further annexed to the latter ſee by queen Elizabeth: and conſequently may be reckoned a part of Hampſhire. They lie in the great bay called Mount St. Michael's, between Cape La Hogue in Normandy, and Cape Frebelle in Bretagne. Jerſey, in the time of the Romans, was called Cæſarea, probably from the dictator (for that the Romans were here, is evident from an ancient camp near the manor of Dilament, and from ſeveral of their coins found in different parts of the iſland) and the modern name is only a corruption of the old one; as Jer, for Cæſar, and ey, an iſland, or Cæſar's iſland. Augia was a name of ſtill earlier date than that given by the Romans. Jerſey lies in lat. 49 deg. 7 min. N. and long. 2 deg. 26 min. W. from the meridian of London; eighteen miles W. of Normandy, and eighty-four S. of Portland, in Dorſetſhire. It is not above twelve Engliſh miles in length; and its greateſt breadth at each extremity is but between ſix and ſeven, being about thirty in circuit: it is defended by rocks and quickſands; but theſe prove dangerous to its navigation; and the north ſide, by reaſon of its high cliffs, is almoſt inacceſſible; but the ſouth ſide is nearly level with the water. The valleys are well watered with brooks, which drive ſeveral corn and fulling-mills. Here they have plenty of cattle and ſheep; ſmall indeed, but their wool is fine, and their fleſh is ſweet. Their butter is very good, and honey incomparable. They have here abundance of ſea-fowl, alſo ſoland geeſe or barnacles. This iſland abounds with fiſh; beſides ſuch as are common in England, they have ſeveral peculiar ſpecies. The horſes are good for draught, but few of them fit for the ſaddle. The only wild game here is hares and rabbits. The iſland produces roots and herbs, but not corn enough for the inhabitants, who have it either from England or France, and ſometimes for cheapneſs they ſend to fetch it from Dantzic; the woollen manufactory of ſtockings, caps, &c. and the culture of cyder, of which they make 24,000 hogſheads in ſome years, though they expor little, together with the increaſe of incloſures and and highways, taking them off the tillage of the land. The fields here are incloſed with large mounds of earth, from ſix to eight or ten feet high; proportionally thick and ſolid, planted with quickſets, trees, and many of them faced with ſtone. The ſea-weed, called vraid, ſerves them both for fuel, and is the common manure uſed on their land. French wine and brandy being very cheap, it is not worth their while to ſet up malting and brewing. The whole iſland being one entire rock, hardly a houſe even on the higheſt hill, but has ſome ſpring near it: and here is one impregnated with a purging mineral. The climate of Jerſey is in general ſalubrious, and the temperate inhabitants live to a great age, though ſometimes the ague attacks them. The tides here are rapid and ſtrong; and by reaſon of the vaſt chain of rocks round the iſland, the water is at no time ſtill, as in the reſt of the Engliſh channel. The cold is not ſo violent in Jerſey as in other places of the ſame latitude, it being tempered by breezes almoſt continually blowing from the ſea; but ſubject to ſtorms by weſterly winds. This iſland is extremely well ſituated for trade in time of peace, and for annoying the French by their privateers in time of war. The inhabitants are computed to be about 20,000. French is the language both of the pulpit and the bar. The chief officer, who repreſents the king's perſon, is the governor. On the iſland are five well diſciplined regiments of militia, and the civil government is adminiſtered by a bailey, aſſiſted by twelve jurats.

It was a very famous city while the Jews inhabited the country; and in its moſt flouriſhing ſtate, it conſiſted of four parts, each being incloſed within its own walls; namely, 1. The old city, which ſtood on Mount Zion, where king David built a palace. 2. The lower city, ſtiled alſo the Daughter of Zion, as being built after it; where king Solomon's palace ſtood, alſo Herod's theatre and amphitheatre, the latter capable of containing 80,000 perſons. 3. The new city, moſtly inhabited by tradeſmen and numbers of merchants. And 4. Mount Moriah, were Solomon's magnificent temple ſtood. But all this glory has long ſince been laid in the duſt, in exact conformity to our Saviour's prophecy, particularly with regard to the latter, "that one ſtone of it ſhould not be left upon "another." It lies thirty-five miles E. of the Levant ſea, and ninety-four S. of Damaſcus; and ſtands on a high rock, the aſcents to which, on all ſides, are exceeding ſteep, except that on the N. and ſurrounded with a deep valley encompaſſed with hills.

JOHN'SON (BEN) was deſcended from a Scots family, was born at Weſtminſter in 1574, and was educated in the ſchool there under the famous Camden; but upon his father's death, who loſt his eſtate under queen Mary, his mother marrying a bricklayer, Ben was taken from ſchool and obliged to work at his father-in-law's trade; but greatly diſliking that employment, he went into the Low Countries, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his bravery. Upon his return to England, he applied himſelf to his former ſtudies. Shakeſpeare is ſaid to have firſt introduced him to the world, by recommending a play of his which the actors had refuſed; and Mr. Pope remarks, that when Ben got poſſeſſion of the ſtage, he brought critical learning into vogue; for till then the Engliſh had no thoughts of writing upon the model of the ancients; but perhaps his fancy had exerted itſelf with greater energy and ſtrength, had he leſs copied the ancients; for ſtruck with the correctneſs and truth of compoſition in the old claſſics, and inflamed by paſſionate admiration to emulate their beauties, he was inſenſibly led to imagine that equal honours were due to ſucceſsful imitation as to original and unborrowed thinking. If he has obſcurities in his writings, he has likewiſe his excellencies; ſince none has been ſo particularly happy in delineating thoſe characters which are generally known by the name of characters of humour: but in nothing is he more truly admirable than in marking his characters; not a ſentence in any of his plays is ſpoken by one perſon that could have entered into the thoughts of another perſon repreſented in it; but every ſentiment is peculiar to him who utters it. The Silent Woman, the Fox and the Alchymiſt, are the moſt eſteemed of his plays, though he wrote above fifty pieces that may be ranked under the ſpecies of dramatic poetry. He died the 6th of Auguſt 1637, and was interred in Weſtminſter Abbey.

IPSWI'CH, S. by the Saxons called Gipeſwick, from the river Gippen called then ſo, on account of its winding ſtream, but now the Orwell; a very neat and well-built town, and the capital of Suffolk, forming a kind of half-moon upon the bank of the river to the W. It is above a mile long from St. Matthews to St. Helen's on the road, and above a mile broad. It ſtill carries on a maritime trade; but this is not ſo conſiderable as formerly. Here are only twelve pariſh churches inſtead of fourteen (twenty-one) in its moſt flouriſhing ſtate, beſides meeting-houſes; and the number of its ſhips are alſo diminiſhed. Over the river is a good ſtone-bridge leading to Stoke-hamlet. Its principal manufactures are linen and woollen. Though ſhips of 500 tons may, upon a ſpring tide, come up very near this town, and many of the like burthen have been built here, the river is ſcarcely navigable above the town, even for the ſmalleſt boats; nor does the tide, which riſes ſometimes thirteen or fourteen feet, and ſo make twenty-four feet very near the town, flow much farther up the river. No place in Great Britain is more commodiouſly ſituated for the Greenland fiſhery than Ipſwich; not only for cheapneſs of building, fitting out their veſſels, &c. but the ſame wind that carries them from the mouth of the haven, is fair to the very ſeas of Greenland. It is governed by two bailiffs, and ſends two members to parliament. Here is a ſpacious market-place, where, on Tueſdays and Thurſdays every week, is ſold ſmall meat; on Wedneſday and Friday fiſh, and Saturday is for all ſorts of proviſions, theſe being very plentiful and cheap. Its annual fairs are on May 4, for lean cattle and toys; July 25, for fruit and toys; and September 25, for butter and cheeſe. It is alſo an inexhauſtible ſtore-houſe for timber, great quantities of which, now their ſhip-building trade has abated, are ſent to the king's yards at Chatham. An excellent charity for the relief of poor clergymens widows and orphans in Suffolk, has been ſet on foot in and about Ipſwich, by voluntary ſubſcription, which from 61. the firſt year, namely, from 1704 to 1740, has amounted to 4416 l. beſides gifts and legacies to the ſum of 554 l. French refugees ſettled in this place at firſt, and a linen manufacture was ſet up in their favour, but did not ſucceed. It lies forty-eight miles from Bury, and ſixty-eight from London.

I'REFUL, Adj. angry; raging.

I'REFULLY, Adv. in a manner which ſhews great anger.

I'RELAND, S. an iſland in the Atlantic ocean, between which and North America there are no intermediate ones, except the Azores or weſtern iſlands; and even theſe are in a lower latitude. The Uiſts, Harris, and Lewis, lie on the N. between it and Iceland, and it has the iſland of Great Britain on the E. and N. E. The natives and Scottiſh Highlanders call it Erin or Ierne; Ptolemy gave it the name of Britannia Parva, or Britannia Minor, which ancient Latin writers call Jerna, Juverna, ſometimes Iris, &c. and thoſe of a more modern date, Hibernia; the derivation of which by authors being various, a detail of the different etymologies would be more irkſome than ſatisfactory from any thing that yet appears. It lies between lat. 51 and 56 deg. N. and between long. 5 and 10 deg. W. It is about 259 miles in length, and 148 in breadth. It lies fifty-two miles from Holyhead in North Wales, and eighteen or twenty from Galloway, and but little more from the Mull of Kintyre, in Argyleſhire, both which are in Scotland. The principal rivers in Ireland are, the noble river of Shannon; the Liffy, called the princeſs of the Iriſh rivers, as gracing the capital, though nothing near ſo conſiderable as the Shannon; the Boyne; the Barrow, and Ouſe, which join above the town of Roſs; the Slone; and the principal river in Ulſter, or the N. of Ireland, is the Bane. In this country are ſeveral loughs, or lakes, both ſalt and freſh; the former of which are properly inlets of the ſea at the mouths of rivers. The principal of theſe are Lough-Ern in Ulſter, and Lough-Neagh in the ſame province. The ancient Iriſh, or thoſe natives who have not yet been thoroughly civilized, and called Kearns, are ſtrong and nimble, courteous to ſtrangers, impatient of abuſe or injury, implacable in enmity, and vehement in all affections. The language is originally Britiſh, or at leaſt a dialect of it; but it has received ſuch a tincture by intermixture with foreigners, that only ſome of the original words are remaining; the names of mountains, iſles, waters, &c. are ſtill moſtly Britiſh. Who were the firſt inhabitants of Ireland, cannot be learned from records, or any other authentic evidence; and therefore only traced from conjecture. The moſt generally prevailing opinion is, that they derive from the Britons, or are at leaſt of the ſame original ſtock with them, from the Spaniards or Cantabrians. They received Chriſtianity very early, the greateſt part of the iſland having been converted by St. Patrick, by which he obtained the character of the Iriſh apoſtle. Nor was religion their only character; but their learning is too much celebrated both by ancient and modern authors, who tell us, that the Saxons in particular very commonly ſent over their children hither for a liberal education. The inhabitants are moſtly now brought over to the cuſtoms and faſhions of the Engliſh, except in ſome parts where they live in the old Iriſh way. It is governed now by Great Britain, the king of which ſends thither an Engliſh nobleman of diſtinction as viceroy or deputy, who is commonly called Lord Lieutenant, and is changed every three years. The king alſo appoints the council of Ireland. This vicegerent's power and ſtate is very conſiderable. The laws and courts of juſtice, &c. in Ireland are much the ſame as thoſe in England. Their acts of parliament, in order to have the force of laws, muſt be approved by the king of Great Britain in his privy-council; and an act of the Britiſh parliament will alter or abrogate any law in Ireland. An appeal alſo lies from a ſentence in any of the Iriſh courts of law to thoſe in Weſtminſter-hall, and to the houſe of peers in Great Britain. The members of the houſe of commons in Ireland hold their ſeats during life, unleſs upon the demiſe of the king of Great Britain. A body of about 12,000 men are kept in pay on the Iriſh eſtabliſhment, among which are few or none of the natives. Theſe are uſually quartered in barracks, and not in the public inns, as is uſual in Great Britain. The religion eſtabliſhed by law is the ſame with that of England, under archbiſhops and biſhops; and generally the clergy here are better provided for than in England. The univerſity of Dublin is the only one in the kingdom, conſiſting of one college, in which are about 600 ſtudents. So fertile is this country, that their beef and butter ſupply France, Flanders, Spain, Portugal, and the Weſt Indies; though lately an act of the Britiſh parliament allows theſe two articles, with their live cattle, to be imported into Great Britain. The Iriſh being prohibited from manufacturing their wool, and exporting their cloth, they run a good deal of the former to France and other countries, by which means theſe are enabled to underſel us in foreign markets.

ITALY, S. a part of Europe anciently eſteemed, and ſtill juſtly allowed, to be the moſt celebrated in the world; not only as it was the ſeat of the Roman empire, whence laws were iſſued out over the greateſt part of the globe for the government of thoſe mighty kingdoms which it had brought under its yoke, but as it was then, and is ſtill, in ſome meaſure, one of the moſt fertile and healthy ſpots on the ſurface of the earth: ſo that it was emphatically ſtiled happy by ancient authors, where Ceres and Bacchus ſtrove which ſhould moſt bleſs its favourite inhabitants; the former with the greateſt plenty and variety of grain and fruit, and the latter with the moſt exquiſite wines. But if we extend our views further, what harveſt doth this country yield, of the moſt valiant and experienced generals of antiquity, the nobleſt orators, the fineſt poets, and the moſt famous hiſtorians; and of an infinite number of other eminent perſonages, both in early and more modern days? all which it would be too tedious to enumerate particularly. And if to this we take in the ſtupendous monuments of their power, as their ſtately temples, aqueducts, cauſeways, highways, public baths, amphitheatres, &c. we ſhall eaſily allow, that hardly ever any country could boaſt of greater advantages. However, if the martial art has been lately leſs cultivated, the more ſoft ones of architecture, ſculpture, painting, muſic, &c. have been carried here to a very great height; and yet the more noble ſciences have not been neglected for the ſake of theſe. And if it hath not produced ſuch bold philoſophers as Deſcartes, or ſuch eminent ones as Sir Iſaac Newton, the fate of a Galileo may have intimidated them from venturing too far in that kind of dangerous learning. Italy was anciently governed by a great number of petty kings, whoſe power degenerating into tyranny, obliged their ſubjects to form themſelves into commonalities of various denominations. The greateſt part of the country was known by the names of Heſperia, Saturnia, Auſonia, Oenotria, Canicula, Latium, and laſtly Italy. Italy lies between lat. 38 deg. but including Sicily, between 36 and 46 deg. of N. latitude, and between long. 7 and 19 deg. E. It is bounded on the N. by Switzerland and the Alps, which ſeparate it from Germany; on the E. by the Adriatic, on the S. by the Mediterranean, and to the W. by that and the Alps, which divide it from France: and if Savoy be included, which lies on the W. ſide of the Alps, between Italy and France, it extends a degree farther W. which however is uſually deſcribed with Italy, as being contiguous to Piedmont. The figure of the main land of Italy reſembles that of a boot; and from N. W. to S. E. it is upwards of 600 miles in length, but of very unequal breadth. In the N. parts, which may be conſidered as the top of the boot, it is 400 miles broad from E. to W. in the middle part or calf of the leg, is about 120; and towards the S. that is, about the inſtep, 80. The diviſion of Italy, in the reign of Auguſtus, was into Ciſalpine Gaul, Italia Propria, and Græcia Magna, which continued, ſome ſmall alterations excepted, during all the time of the Roman emperors, till the reign of Honorius, when the empire becoming extremely weak, the Huns, Goths, Vandals, Heruli, &c. paſſed the Alps, parcell'd the greateſt part of the country into little kingdoms and ſtates, and held it in ſubjection till the reign of Juſtinian. This prince having cleared the country of thoſe barbarians, erected the exarchate of Ravenna, and made that city the capital. This new government having laſted 183 years, under ſeventeen exarchs, who maintained the power of the emperors of the eaſt, was ſucceeded by that of the Longobardi, or Lombards, who having taken Ravenna from Eutychius the laſt exarch, erected a kingdom in Gallia Togata, under Aſtulphus. 'Tis to theſe we owe that excellent body of laws, ſtill famed under the name of Longobardian, and compiled by their king Rotharis. At length the emperors of the eaſt having quite loſt their power in Italy, pope Leo III. who had been highly obliged to the French for protecting the holy ſee againſt the Lombards, invited king Pepin into Italy, and ſoon after his ſon Charlemagne, who was crowned king of the Franks; and on Chriſtmas-day 801, was crowned emperor by that pontiff, in St. Peter's church at Rome. From this time, new kingdoms, dukedoms and ſtates were erected in Italy; the pope having had ſeveral conſiderable territories beſtowed on him by the emperor. The ſoil of Italy is generally very good and fertile. The low lands afford great quantity of good paſturage for vaſt numbers of cattle; and the climate, excepting ſome few places in the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, moſtly eſteemed temperate and healthy. The modern Italians are generally very polite and affable, ingenious, and ready-witted; and of great application both in ſtudy and buſineſs. They commonly bear a great affection towards their kindred and alliance; and they are very ambitious of honour and preferment; highly valuing themſelves as the offspring and ſucceſſors of the ancient Romans. The nobility and gentry chuſe to live moſtly in towns, and to lay out their money rather in fine houſes, coſtly furniture, ſtatues, paintings, and ſtately architecture, beautiful gardens, &c. than in keeping up rich tables, or luxurious eating and drinking. No nation, except the Spaniſh, is more ſcrupulouſly nice in all the punctilio's of civility than the Italians, nor more profuſe of ſtrained compliments, pompous titles, &c. Italy abounds every where with hoſpitals for the ſick, lame, lunatics, and foundlings; but eſpecially for the entertainment of pilgrims and travellers going to and from Rome, Loretto, &c. They reckon the day from ſun-ſet to ſun-ſet, and make their clocks ſtrike the twenty-four hours round, inſtead of dividing the day into two parts. The Italian language is a kind of corruption of the ancient Roman, which latter was in its higheſt perfection in the reign of the emperor Auguſtus; but it ſoon after fell into decay, till by the inundations of the Goths and Vandals, it became ſo barbarous, that it ſcarcely retained any traces of its origin: but from the height of barbariſm it has now dwindled to a ſoft and melodious language, eſpecially fit for muſic. Tuſcany is the country where the beſt Italian is ſpoken. But in Naples, Venice, Piedmont, and other parts, it is more harſh, and blended with the old Gothic, Lombardic, and Etruſcan tongues.

KENT, by the Romans called Cantium, one of the counties of England. It is bounded on the S. W. by Suſſex, on the W. by Surry, on the S. by the Engliſh channel, on the S. E. by Dover ſtreights, and on the E. by the Downs. It is divided from Eſſex and Middleſex on the N. by the river Thames. This county lies in the dioceſes of Canterbury and Rocheſter, is fifty-ſix miles long from E. to W. and thirty broad from S. to N. thirty-ſix from Rye in Suſſex to the mouth of the Thames, containing in all 1,248,000 acres. In it are two cities, Canterbury and Rocheſter; 163 vicarages, 408 pariſhes, 30 conſiderable towns, 1180 villages, and about 220,000 inhabitants. This county is commonly divided into three parts, which have different qualities both of air and ſoil; the upper or E. part, towards the Downs and the Thames, where is proverbially ſaid to be health without wealth; the middle parts, and thoſe near London, are both healthy and wealthy; and the lower parts, as about Romney-marſh, called the Weald of Kent, where is wealth without health, on account of the wet ſoil, though very fruitful in graſs. As the county lies much upon the ſea, the air, though generally thick and foggy, is pretty warm, and often fanned and purified by S. and S. W. winds. The marſhy tracts, though ſubject to agues, are more healthy than the hundreds of Eſſex, and the beach is not ſo ouzy as it is in that county. The country in general abounds with plantations of hops (theſe eſpecially in the neighbourhood of Canterbury) corn-fields, paſture-grounds, woods of oak, beech, and cheſnut; with large orchards of fine cherries (by way of diſtinction and eminence called Kentiſh) alſo pippins: and about Boxley, Foots-cray, North-cray, &c. are ſeveral woods of birch, from which the broom-makers in Kent-ſtreet, Southwark, are commonly ſupplied. The cattle here of all ſorts are reckoned larger than they are in the adjacent counties; and the Weald of Kent is noted for its large bullocks, as well as large timber for ſhip-building. Here are ſeveral parks of fallow-deer, and warrens of greyiſh rabbits; alſo mines of iron, pits of marle and chalk, with woad and madder for dying, likewiſe wool, flax, ſaint-foyn: and on the cliffs between Folkſtone and Dover is plenty of ſamphire.

L

L, A ſemi-vowel, or liquid conſonant, the eleventh letter of the Engliſh alphabet. In the Saxon it was aſpirated as in blaf, Sax. a loaf, as it is at preſent by the Spaniards, and by the Cambro-Britons, in llan, a temple. The figure of the capital L we borrow from the Saxons, which is the ſame as that of the Romans, who likewiſe ſeem to have taken theirs from the A of the Greek, with one of its ſides placed upon the line thus , and if we attend to the form of the Hebrew ל we may, without the leaſt improbability, ſay, that the Greek A ſeems borrowed from it, only by cutting off its tail, or the ſtroke below the line. It is pronounced by putting the tongue to the palate, and breathing from the throat. At the end of a monoſyllable it is always doubled, as in fall, kill, &c. but at the end of a word of two or more ſyllables it is written ſingle, as in doubtful, as it likewiſe is when it occurs in the middle of compound words; for though we write ſkill and full, when they are alone, with a double ll, yet, when they are compounded, we leave out an l in each, as in ſkilful. When it comes before e at the end of a word, it is pronounced as if the e came before it, as in bible. As a numeral, it ſtands for 50, and when a line is drawn over it thus $\overline{L}$ for 50,000.

LA'NCASTER, or, as the natives pronounce it, LONE'CASTER, or LONG'CASTER, ſo called from the river Lon, near the mouth of which it ſtands, and giving name to the whole county. It is the ſhire-town, and an ancient borough, being alſo the Longovicum of the Itinerary, where the Roman lieutenant kept a company in garriſon, called the Longovici, if Longcaſter be not derived from this. Here are ſometimes found the coins of Roman emperors, eſpecially in the ſite of the Benedictine cloyſter here, ſaid to have been formerly the large ſquare of an ancient city; after the demolition of which, by the Scotch, in 1322, they began to build nearer the river, cloſe by a hill, upon which ſtands a fair, ſtrong caſtle; and on the very top of the hill is a large and handſome church: at the bottom is a very fine ſtone-bridge of five arches over the Lon, and on the ſteepeſt part a piece of a very ancient Roman wall, now called Wery-wall. In digging a cellar in this place, ſeveral cups uſed in ſacrifices have been found. This is a mayor corporation, a populous and thriving place, with a tolerable harbour, chiefly for ſmall veſſels; and a cuſtom-houſe, the trade here being much improved of late. In the caſtle are held the county-aſſizes; and here is alſo the county-gaol. The weekly markets here are on Wedneſday and Saturday; the former by grant, and the latter by preſcription; beſides one every other Wedneſday throughout the year, for cattle; and ſeveral other annual fairs. Veſſels of ſeventy tons burden go from hence to America with hard-wares and woollen manufactures; but the neighbouring country is ſo thinly peopled, by reaſon of its barrenneſs, that it cannot take off the ſugars imported thither from our American colonies. This town gave the title of Duke, which ſtill ſubſiſts, as a diſtinct dutchy belonging to the crown. It lies 39 miles from Liverpool, and 232 from London. Lat. 54 deg. N. long. 2 deg. 47 min. W.

LA'NCASHIRE, or the County Palatine of Lancaſter. This is one of the northern counties of England, pent up in narrow bounds, between Yorkſhire on the E. and the Iriſh ſea on the W. but on the S. ſide towards Cheſhire, it is broader, growing narrower, though by degrees, towards the N. where it confines on Weſtmoreland; and there it is divided by an arm of the ſea, ſo that a conſiderable part lies beyond the bay, and joins to Cumberland. This is a large maritime county, being computed ſixty-eight miles long from N. to S. and forty broad from E. to W. though others give it different dimenſions; ſo that the eſtimate of its acres muſt conſequently vary, on which we ſhall not dwell. It is ſaid to contain 240,000 inhabitants, ſix hundreds, twenty-ſeven market-towns, and beſides chapels as large as pariſh-churches ſaid to be upwards of 120, ſixty pariſhes, each of them far exceeding the greateſt any where elſe in the number of its inhabitants: and no leſs than ſixteen of the aforeſaid chapels of eaſe are in one pariſh.

LA'PLAND, the northern part of Sweden. It is ſubdivided into Daniſh, Swediſh, and Muſcovite Lapland. We ſhall here treat only of Swediſh Lapland. After obſerving in general, that all the country which lies above the Bothnic gulph along the coaſt of the North ſea, even to the White or Frozen ſea, is called Lapland, in Latin Lappia or Lapponia. Swediſh Lapland is the moſt conſiderable of the three; and the only one which is tolerably peopled, conſidering the extreme coldneſs of the climate. It is bounded on the N. by Daniſh Lapland, on the E. by Muſcovite Lapland, and on the S. E.

and S. by Bothnia, Angermannia, and Jempterland; and on the W. it is ſeparated from Norway by a ridge of mountains. Its greateſt extent from E. to W. is about 360 miles; and in breadth it extends from lat. 65 deg. 30 min. to 69 deg. N. but neither its length nor breadth are equal every where, it being nearly in the form of a horſe-ſhoe. It is divided into ſix provinces or diſtricts; which are, Angermanland-lapmark, Uma-lapmark, Pitha-lapmark, Lula-lapmark, Torno-lapmark, and Kimi-lapmark; each province borrowing its name from the principal river which waters it. The ancients, to whom the name of Lappia was unknown, called the inhabitants of this country Scritofinni. They at firſt inhabited Finland, from which they were driven more northwards, and hence called Lapps; but the inhabitants themſelves looking upon that as a name of reproach, call themſelves Sabmienladti. They are generally not above four feet and a half high, and ſome even under. Moſt of the men are homely, and ſtoop, having hollow and bleared eyes, a ſhort and flat noſe, and broad face: but they are ſwift, nimble, and ſo ſtrong, that a Norwegian is not able to bend their bows above one half. The women have a complexion mixed with a natural red and white, which is not diſagreeable. They are ſuperſtitious, cowardly, and timorous, alſo haſty and paſſionate, the women eſpecially; and are ſo exceſſively indolent, that they neither go a hunting nor fiſhing, till their proviſions are quite ſpent. Lapland is ſo near the pole, that the ſun does not ſet in ſummer, nor riſe in winter; at which latter ſeaſon the cold is ſo intenſe, that none but the natives can bear it. The more rapid rivers are then frozen up, and the ice two or three, and ſometimes four or five feet thick. In ſummer the weather is quite ſultry, but qualified by ſea-vapours, and by the ſnow continuing all ſummer on the mountain-tops, &c. but autumn and ſpring are unknown in this country. The ſky is generally ſerene, and the air healthy, as being agitated by very boiſterous winds, which blow here almoſt continually. Here is a prodigious number of wild beaſts, as ſtags, bears, wolves, foxes of various colours, martens, hares, glittens, beavers, otters, elk, and rein-deer: the latter is leſs than a ſtag.

LA'PPER, S. one who wraps or laps up; one who laps or licks.

LEI'CESTER, S. the capital and county-town of Leiceſterſhire. In the time of the Romons it was called Ragæ, or Ratæ Coritanorum, as being on the foſſeway, and Roman coins diſcovered here. It ſtands on the river Soare, anciently the Leir; hence its derivation is a city or caſtle on the Leir, and it is half way ſurrounded by the river. It is a very ancient place, was the ſee of a biſhop, and is ſaid to have had once 32 pariſh-churches in it. The firſt law of burning heretics, by which lord Cobham and others ſuffered death, was made in a parliament held here in the reign of king Henry V. declaring the favourers of Wickliff's doctrine heretics and traitors. In the civil wars it was beſieged by king Charles I. and taken by ſtorm May 31, 1645, when his army gave the garriſon no quarter, hanged ſome of the committee, and plundered the inhabitants. Sir Thomas Fairfax not coming ſoon enough to relieve the place, beſieged it again, and forced the new garriſon to ſurrender upon terms. At preſent this is the largeſt, beſt built, and moſt populous town in the ſhire: it is a borough and corporation, governed by a mayor, &c. who returns two members to parliament, and had its firſt charter from king John. Its weekly market on Saturday is well furniſhed with proviſions, eſpecially corn: the freemen of Leiceſter are exempted from paying toll in all the fairs and markets of England. In the high-ſtreet is an excellent piece of workmanſhip in form of our Saviour's croſs. The moſt curious relique of antiquity preſerved here, is a piece of Moſaic pavement at the bottom of a cellar, repreſenting the ſtory of Acteon torn to pieces by his own hounds: it is of moſt exquiſite workmanſhip, the ſtones being only white and brown, and very ſmall. Leiceſter lies 98 miles from London, lat. 52 deg. 37 min. N. long. 1 deg. 7 min. W.

LIN'COLN, a Roman colony, and by them called Lindum colonia, which very eaſily falls into the preſent abbreviated appellation Lincoln, is an ancient city in Lincolnſhire. From its ſituation on a hill it ſeems a collection of five cities. Lincoln is the ſee of a biſhop, and the largeſt dioceſe in England. The cathedral is a magnificent fabric, and reputed the moſt ſpacious of any in England, except York, being, from its ſituation, ſeen from five or ſix counties. It has a double croſs or tranſept, with two ſpires or towers, which are mean, but not for want of height, and in the N. tower is the fineſt great bell in England, called Tom of Lincoln, as being conſecrated probably to Thomas à Becket. It weighs four tons 1894 pounds, will hold 424 gallons, and is 22 feet eight inches in circumference. The middle or rood tower is the higheſt in the kingdom. This is a city and county of itſelf, its juriſdiction extending twenty miles round. It is governed by a mayor, who returns two members to parliament, has twelve aldermen, two ſheriffs, &c. It has given title of Earl to the Clinton family ever ſince the reign of queen Elizabeth. Here are four charity-ſchools, in each of which thirty poor children are taught by clergymens widows. Lincoln lies fifty-two miles from York, and 128 from London. Lat. 53 deg. 15 min. N. long. 27 min. W.

LIN'COLNSHIRE, a maritime county, and one of the largeſt in England; but a great part of it is fenny grounds, and overflowed with water. It is divided from Northamptonſhire on the S. by the river Welland, as it is from Yorkſhire on the W. by the Humber. It has the German ocean on the E. and is bounded on the W. with ſome parts of Yorkſhire, Nottinghamſhire, Leiceſterſhire, and Rutlandſhire. It is generally reckoned almoſt ſixty miles from N. to S. and in the middle, where wideſt, thirty-five; though Templeman makes its length ſixty-ſeven, and breadth forty-three. It contains thirty wapentakes or hundreds, in which are 688 pariſhes, one city, five parliamentary boroughs, thirty-four other market-towns, and about 245,540 inhabitants; alſo thirteen parks, and two caſtles. In Lincolnſhire are ſeveral large rivers, particularly the Nen, Welland, Gnaih, Witham, Bane, Trent, Dun, and Ankam; all which abound with fiſh; and among other wild fowl here are two ſorts, which are exceeding good, namely, knutes and dotterels. The inland country produces corn, the fens coleſeed and very rich paſtures; ſo that their breed of cattle exceeds in largeneſs thoſe of any county in England, except Somerſetſhire; which tranſplanting ſome of the Lincolnſhire kine a few years ago, have much improved their ſize in their ſtill richer grounds. Their horſes alſo are excellent, and large withal.

LI'TURGY, S. [λειτος, public, and εργον, Gr. a work] a form of prayers uſed in public worſhip. The Engliſh liturgy was firſt compoſed, approved, and confirmed in parliament anno 1548, the offices for the morning and evening prayer being then in the ſame form as they ſtand in at preſent, excepting that there was no confeſſion and abſolution; the office beginning with the Lord's prayer. In the communion, the ten commandments were omitted; the offertory was made with bread and wine mixed with water, and in the prayer for Chriſt's church militant, thanks were given to God for his wonderful grace declared in his ſaints, in the bleſſed Virgin, the patriarchs, prophets, apoſtles, and martyrs; and the ſaints departed were commended to God's mercy and peace: to this the conſecratory prayer, now uſed, was joined as a part, only with ſome words now left out, petitioning that the bread and wine might be to us the body and blood of Jeſus the beloved Son, &c. In baptiſm, beſides the form of the croſs made on the child's forehead, another was made on his breaſt, with an adjuration of the devil to go out of him; after which the child was dipped three times in the font, if well, but otherwiſe ſprinkled. Beſides theſe, ſome other ceremonies are omitted in the office for the ſick, as is ſuppoſed, in 1551, when the form was altered at the ſolicitation of Calvin.

LOCKE, (JOHN) was born at Wrington, ſeven miles from Briſtol, in 1632. His father belonged to the law, and was ſteward or court-keeper to col. Alex. Popham: our author was ſent by him to Weſtminſter-ſchool, and was removed from thence in 1651 to Chriſt-church, Oxon, where he was a ſtudent. His peculiar ſtudy was phyſic, in which he made no ſmall progreſs, as appears from the dedication of the great Sydenham to his Obſervationes Medicæ. To enumerate the public employs he was honoured with, and diſcharged with no ſmall praiſe, would be to reflect fame upon him from a quarter, whence perſons of leſs genius might expect it. For if we conſider the great ſervice he has done to philoſophy and religion, by ſubverting the babel of ſchool learning, overthrowing the ſyſtem of Ariſtotle, which was for ſeveral ages looked on as the ſtandard of truth, and his introducing ſuch a ſyſtem in its ſtead, as contributes to the enlarging our minds, the diſcovering of truth, and the improving of reaſon to its utmoſt extent, we muſt look on him as a wonder, or at leaſt a glory, not only to his own country, but likewiſe to his ſpecies. His life was not leſs amiable than his writings; his converſation being eaſy and facetious; he won the love of thoſe that knew him by his probity, and was always ſafe from the attacks, either of falſehood or a flatterer. His complaiſance was free from ſervility; his behaviour ſuch as beſpoke a perſon of great experience, and as great humanity, on which account, he gained the reſpect of his inferiors, the eſteem of his equals, and the confidence of his ſuperiors. His temper was ſomething choleric, but ſoon pacified; and if he retained any reſentment, it was againſt himſelf, for having given way to a paſſion, which, he ſaid, might do a great deal of harm, but never did any good. His regard for religion was great and ſincere, and that for the Chriſtian diſpenſation higher than ſome of his adverſaries will perhaps allow. His death, which he ſaw approaching through the viſtoes of ſeveral years, gave him no trouble; for his thoughts and ſtudies, in his latter days, were employed purely in preparing for it.

LO'CKER, S. any thing that is faſtened with a lock; a drawer.

LO'CKRAN, S. a kind of ranunculus.

LOCOMO'TION, S. [from locus, Lat. and motio, Lat.] the power or act of changing place. "All progreſſion or animal locomotion." Brown.

To LOLL, V. N. to lean in any idle or lazy manner againſt any thing. To hang out, applied to the tongue of a beaſt.

LON'DON, S. a city and county of itſelf, in Middleſex; the ſee of a biſhop, and the capital of Great Britain, and of all the Britiſh dominions. It is the royal reſidence, and is ſituated moſtly on the N. bank of the river Thames; part of it, namely, the borough of Southwark, a dependency of the city of London, being in Surry, and on the S. banks of the ſaid river; but London and Southwark communicate with each other by means of a bridge of hewn ſtone, conſiſting of 19 arches, which was 33 years in building, and finiſhed in 1209; and about a mile farther up the river is another bridge lately built, ſuppoſed to be one of the fineſt in the world, and called Weſtminſter-bridge. Within the city walls, and its ancient bars and gates, it takes in but a narrow compaſs: but if, in the general acceptation of London, we take in all that vaſt maſs of buildings, reaching from Blackwall in the E. to Tothill-fields in the W. from Southwark S. to Iſlington N. and from Peterborough-houſe on the bank-ſide at Weſtminſter to Cavendiſh-ſquare, and even to Marybone, and all the new buildings by and beyond Groſvenor and Hanover ſquares to the Brentford road one way, to the Acton road another; a prodigy all this, of ſuch buildings as nothing in the world does, or ever did ſurpaſs, except it was old Rome in Trajan's time, when the walls of that city were ſaid to be fifty miles in circuit, and the number of its inhabitants 6,800,000. The figure of London is very irregular, being ſtretched out in buildings at the pleaſure of every undertaker, for conveniency of trade, or otherwiſe: whereas Rome was round, with very few irregularities. Its form, however, including the city of Weſtminſter and borough of Southwark, is nearly oblong, being about five miles in length from W. to E. if meaſured in a direct line from Hyde-park-corner to the end of Limehouſe; and upwards of ſix, if the ſtreets be followed, or from Limehouſe to the end of Tothil-ſtreet in Weſtminſter, ſeven miles and a half. London, including the buildings on both ſides the water, is in ſome places three miles broad from S. to N. as from St. George's in Southwark to Shoreditch in Middleſex; or two miles, as from Peterborough-houſe to Montague-houſe in Great Ruſſel-ſtreet; and in ſome places not half a mile, as in Wapping, and leſs in Rotherhith. Several villages, formerly ſtanding at a great diſtance, are now joined to the ſtreets by continued buildings; and more making haſte to meet in like manner, as at Deptford, Iſlington, Mile-End, and Newington-Butts in Surry. But an act of parliament, obtained by the city of London, in 1760, for widening its paſſages, pulling down its crowded gates, and laying it more open in many places, will probably put a ſtop to the rapid progreſs of buildings in the extreme parts of the town: ſince the city will be then as healthy to live in as any of the outſkirts, and equally commodious; and be not ſo liable to ſuch dreadful conflagrations as have happened within theſe few years from too much crowding. The number of inhabitants have been variouſly gueſſed at: Maitland, in 1739, computes, that within the walls and bars of the city are 725,903; but Sir William Petty, at his laſt computation, ſuppoſed it to contain a million; though in this he takes in a greater compaſs ſure than Maitland. And in the large circuit abovementioned, ſays the author of the Tour, it may be reaſonably concluded there are about 1,500,000 ſouls. This city is under excellent regulations, particularly with regard to beggars, lights, pavements, &c. It is governed by a lord mayor, twenty-five aldermen, two ſheriffs, the recorder, and common-council; their juriſdiction being confined to the city and its liberties, as alſo to Southwark. They are conſervators of the river Thames, from Stanes-bridge in Surry and Middleſex to the river Medway in Kent; and ſome ſay up to Rocheſter-bridge. The government of the out-parts is by juſtices and the ſheriffs of London, who are likewiſe ſheriffs of Middleſex. What adds moſt to the affluence and ſplendor of this great city, is its commodious port, though near forty miles from the main ſea; whither many thouſand ſhips of burthen annually reſort from all parts of the world: and thoſe of moderate bulk can come up as far as London-bridge, though the very largeſt are ſtill lower down in the river; while large barges and weſt-country boats can go through bridge, and a great diſtance up the Thames, carrying goods of all kinds to and from the metropolis; which will be ſtill more commodious when the middle arches are widened; a work now near being finiſhed. London is reckoned to have two thirds of the whole trade in England. The ſtrength of this city, having no ſort of fortifications, unleſs we reckon the Tower of London as its citadel, conſiſts in the number of its inhabitants, who are commonly computed to be one ſeventh of all the people in England, and one eighth of the whole in Great Britain. The town is well ſupplied with water from the Thames, the New River brought from Ware in Hartfordſhire, and the ſprings at Hampſtead. London annually conſumes above 700,000 ſheep and lambs, and 100,000 head of cattle, beſides a vaſt number of hogs, pigs, poultry of all kinds, &c. &c. In the ſtreets ply daily about 800 hackney-coaches, beſides a great number of ſedan chairs. The penny-poſt, for carrying of letters, or ſmall paper parcels within the bills of mortality, or ten miles round London every way, is a great conveniency. Here is a royal ſociety, founded by king Charles II. who hold their meetings under a preſident at their houſe in Crane-court, Fleet-ſtreet, where is an obſervatory, library, and muſæum: and in 1751 a ſociety of antiquaries obtained a charter. The public places for amuſement in this city are numerous; as in ſummer, Ranelagh, Vauxhall, and Marybone-gardens; alſo St. James's and Hyde-parks, with a great variety of others of leſs note: and in winter are plays, operas, balls, concerts, &c. London conſiſts of ſeventy-two companies, each of which has a maſter and wardens, or aſſiſtants, annually choſen. The city is divided into twenty-ſix wards, and over each preſides an alderman, who has his deputy; and out of the court of aldermen is annually choſen a lord mayor, who reſides, during his mayoralty, in an elegant and ſpacious ſtructure, finiſhed in 1751, and called the Manſion-houſe: but its not having yet a ſufficient opening round it, great part of its beauty is loſt to the eye. London ſends four members to parliament; and lies about 320 miles S. of Edinburgh, 202 N. W. of Paris, 186 W. of Amſterdam, 520 S. W. of Copenhagen, 613 N. W. of Vienna, 264 S. E. of Dublin, 865 N. E. of Madrid, 841 N. W. of Rome, and 1389 N. W. of Conſtantinople, lat. 51 deg. 32 min. N. and under the firſt meridian of our Engliſh maps.

MAN, S. an iſland lying between Great Britain and Ireland. Cæſar calls it Mona, Ptolemy Monœda, and Pliny Monobia. It lies about twelve miles S. of Galloway, in Scotland; 26 N. of Angleſey, in Wales; 40 W. of the coaſt of Cumberland; and 44 E. of that of Down, in Ireland. So that England, Scotland, and Ireland, may in a clear day be eaſily ſeen from it. Man lies between lat. 53 deg. 53 min. and 54 deg. 25 min. N. and long. 4 deg. 30 min. W. being near thirty miles long, and between eight and nine broad. It has been ſucceſſively inhabited by the Britons, Scotch, Norwegians; but at laſt fell into the hands of the Engliſh, about the cloſe of the reign of king Edward I. or beginning of his ſon Edward II. and has ever ſince continued under their juriſdiction. The grant of it, together with the patronage of the biſhopric, was made by king Henry IV. to Sir John Stanley, and his heirs; in which family it has continued, till by marriage it came from the earl of Derby to the duke of Athol in Scotland, who is ſtiled king in Man; but the king of England has the ſovereignty, who is king of Man; and thus the diſtinction is commonly made. This iſland is entirely ſurrounded with rocks, and conſequently has a very dangerous coaſt, and not practicable without a pilot. The ſoil of its ſorthern parts is ſandy and heathy; but that in the ſouthern yields good paſture, with arable land, producing all ſorts of grain, more than is ſufficient for the conſumption of the natives; and the air here is reckoned healthful, as ſome of them live to a great age. They are a medley, principally of all the circumjacent parts of the Britiſh dominions. A ridge of mountains runs almoſt through the whole length of the iſland, ſupplying the inhabitants quite round with very good water, and excellent peat, the only fuel in the iſland. The higheſt of theſe mountains is Snafield. The number of its inhabitants, beſides ſtrangers, is reckoned at 20,000. They are an orderly, hoſpitable people. Their language is the Pictiſh, or a dialect of the Erſe, ſpoken in the weſtern iſles of Scotland; with a mixture of other tongues; and the names of places here indicate Highland original. Its ſtaple commodities are chiefly wool, hides, and tallow; and they are extremely well ſituated for a foreign trade, but more ſo for running of goods, eſpecially brandies and wines; for which reaſon they have been brought under the ſame laws as England, with regard to cuſtoms.

He was entered at Chriſt's College, Cambridge, in 1625, and taking his maſter's degree in 1632, he quitted the univerſity. On the death of his mother, he ſet out on his travels in 1638, viſited Hugo Grotius at Paris, and made the tour of Florence, Vienna, Rome and Naples. The civil wars breaking out in England, it prevented his going farther, and occaſioned his return. What part he acted in the rebellion is too well known to require a particular detail. To paſs over other actions of this author's life, we ſhall only hint, that it ſeems not entirely juſtifiable, with reſpect to his treatment of his wife, for ſtaying a little longer than ſhe promiſed on a viſit at her father's. His Paradiſe Loſt, which is deſervedly eſteemed the glory of the Engliſh nation, may be reſembled to the ſun, which has likewiſe its ſpots. But it is matter of ſurprize, that a perſon engaged in actual rebellion againſt his ſovereign, and employing his pen in vindicating his murder, ſhould be almoſt at the ſame time engaged in a work which deſcribes the horrid conſequences of a rebellion among the ſpiritual orders, and ſeems to be the grand object he had in view in writing his Paradiſe Loſt. The beauties of this piece for ſublimity of thought, fertility of invention, chaſteneſs of language, and beautifulneſs of images, has at preſent no parallel; but at the ſame time it muſt be owned it bears the ſtamp of human frailty, and has likewiſe ſome glaring errors; but had the author's political life and principles been as unexceptionable as this performance, who would not have wiſhed to have lived, as well as to write like him?

N

N, A liquid conſonant, and ſemi vowel; the thirteenth letter in the Engliſh alphabet, having an invariable ſound: after m it is almoſt loſt, as in condemn. The Hebrews call their נ nun N, which ſignifies a child, it being derived from מ mem, their M, as is evident by conſidering them placed together, מנ: in the ſame manner our ſmall n is formed from the ſmall m by omitting the laſt ſtroke. From the capital N, which is the ſame in the Greek, Latin, Gothic, and Saxon alphabets, the ſmall n of the Greeks ſeems to be formed, by the omiſſion of the firſt ſtroke of the capital, as N v, and in the ſame manner may we trace the ſhape of the Runic capital, which, on the contrary, is formed from the omiſſion of the laſt ſtroke of the Greek capital. In compoſition, before an l, b, p, and m, the n is frequently changed into an m, and before an l and r into an l and r, according to the cuſtom of the Romans, as illicit, for inlicit; impreſs, for inpreſs; irreverent, for inreverent.

ſent. When uſed for a numeral, N ſtands for 600, and with a daſh over it thus $\overline{N}$ for 9000. In abbreviatures it is likewiſe uſed for numero or number; as No. V. i. e. number 5.

NE'WSMONGER, S. one who deals in news-papers; one who makes it his buſineſs to hear and tell news.

NE'WTON, [Sir Iſaac] deſcended from an ancient family in Lancaſhire, was born in the county of Lincoln, in 1642. At twelve years of age he was put to the free ſchool at Grantham, by his mother, who ſoon took him away again to initiate him betimes in taking care of his own affairs: but finding him very careleſs in things of that nature, and entirely devoted to his books, ſhe ſent him to Grantham again, from whence he went to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he entered in 1660, being then eighteen years of age. His genius for mathematics was ſo great, that he underſtood the elements of Euclid, as ſoon as he read them, and could, by barely caſting his eyes on the contents of the theoreme, make himſelf a perfect maſter of them. In 1664, he took the degree of bachelor of arts, and in 1666, being then retired from the univerſity on account of the plague, and ſitting in his garden, was led by a train of thoughts, occaſioned by the fall of ſome bloſſoms, to thoſe diſcoveries relating to gravity, and the power by which the celeſtial bodies are retained in their orbits, which have ſince immortalized both his own memory and that of his country. In 1669, he was choſen profeſſor of mathematics in the univerſity of Cambridge, on the reſignation of Dr. Barrow; and in that year, and the two ſubſequent ones, read a diſcourſe of optical lectures, replete with ſuch ſuch diſcoveries on that ſubject, as both aſtoniſh and delight. In 1687, his mathematical principles were publiſhed, a book which, being too profound to be underſtood by every one, met with no ſmall oppoſition; but when it was once known, was ſo well received that nothing was heard from all quarters, but one general ſhout of admiration. This work ſeemed to be the production of a genius or celeſtial intelligence rather than of a man, in the opinion of the Marquis de l'Hoſpital, who uſed to aſk the Engliſh, that viſited him, "Does Mr. New-"ton eat, drink, or ſleep like other men? I "repreſent him to myſelf as one of the Ge-"nii, or a celeſtial intelligence entirely diveſt-"ed of matter." The ſame year as his Principia, &c. were publiſhed, he appeared one of the moſt zealous defenders of the privileges of the univerſity of Cambridge, when attacked by king James II. and was on that account nominated one of the delegates of the univerſity to the high commiſſion court. In 1688 he was choſen one of their members for the convention parliament. In 1696 was made warden of the mint, in which office he was of ſignal ſervice, when the money was called in to be recoined. In 1699 he was elected one of the members of the Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris; in 1701 was choſen member of parliament for the univerſity of Cambridge, and in 1703 was elected preſident of the Royal Society, and continued in the chair for twenty-three years without interruption. In the reign of King George I. he was well known at court, and admitted to the confidence of the Princeſs of Wales, i. e. the late Queen, who uſed often to propoſe difficulties on philoſophic ſubjects to him, and to receive his anſwers. His health, till his eightieth year, was generally ſettled, but about that time he began to be afflicted with an incontinence of urine; but for the five years, which preceded his death, he had great intervals of health or eaſe, which he procured by obſerving a ſtrict regimen. But the circumſtance which was the only one that could have perſuaded us of his being mortal, ſeized him with ſuch violence, that large drops of ſweat run down his face; yet ſo illuſtrious was he for patience, that during his agonies, he never uttered the leaſt complaint, nor expreſſed the leaſt impatience, and as ſoon as he had a moment's eaſe, would ſmile and talk with his uſual cheerfulneſs; after having been deprived of his ſenſes for ſome hours, he died on the 20th of March, in the eighty-fifth year of his age, and was interred with great ſolemnity in Weſtminſter abbey. His ſtature was middling; his countenance pleaſing, and venerable at the ſame time, eſpecially when he took off his peruke, and ſhewed his white hairs; which he would often do with a degree of pleaſure. He never made uſe of ſpectacles, and loſt but one tooth in his life. His diſpoſition was ſo meek, and his opinion of himſelf ſo humble, that he would rather have choſen to have ſtolen unknown through life, than to expoſe himſelf to thoſe ſtorms, to which genius and learning generally expoſe thoſe that are illuſtrious for either. So great was his modeſty, that the moſt malicious cenſurers could not charge him with vanity; ſo great his affability, that he always put himſelf upon a level with his company; ſo great his charity, that he would often ſtrip himſelf to ſhew his generoſity to his relations and others, choſe to do his good offices himſelf, and thought a legacy no gift; his candour was ſo great, that he was in love with virtue, wherever he met it, and eſteemed thoſe only to be true ſchiſmatics, who were vicious and wicked; yet was he firmly attached to the eſtabliſhed church; was a firm believer of the truth of revelation, and amidſt the great variety of books he had before him, that which he ſtudied moſt was the bible.

O'STRICH, S. [auſtruche, oſtruce, Fr. abeſtruz, aveſtruz, Span. ſtruzzuo, Ital. ſtrauſz, Teut. ſtruthio, Lat.] a very large bird; its wings are ſhort, and its neck about four or five ſpans. The feathers of its wings are in great eſteem as ornaments. They are hunted by way of courſe, for they never fly, but uſe their wings to aſſiſt them in running. They ſwallow bits of iron in the ſame manner as other birds do gravel or ſtones, to aſſiſt in digeſting their food. They lay their eggs on the ground, hide them under the ſand, and leave them to be hatched by the ſun. The ſtupidity of this bird is remarkable on two accounts: firſt, in covering its head with reeds, and thinking, that notwithſtanding its body is all that time expoſed, it cannot be ſeen. Secondly, the manner in which they are caught; they that go in purſuit of them draw the ſkin of an oſtrich's neck on one hand, which proves a ſufficient lure to take them with the other. It is obſervable that they have ſo little brain, that the emperor Heliogabalus had the brains of 600 heads one night for his ſupper.

Uſed with ſide, the contrary. Uſed with each, it implies reciprocation, ſomething beſides, or more; the next. After next, it implies the third, joined with day. Sometimes it is uſed elliptically, for an other thing, or ſomething different.

O'THERWISE, Adv. in a different manner; by other means or cauſes; in other reſpects.

O'TTER, S. [oter, otyr, Sax otter, Belg. and Teut.] an amphibious animal that preys upon fiſh: the toes of its hinder feet are joined by a membrane like thoſe of a gooſe or a duck, but the fore feet have none: its teeth reſemble thoſe of a dog; and its tail, which is long and taper, that of a cat. It harbours in borrows, which it makes near the water ſide, and is ſometimes tamed, and uſed to drive fiſh into a net.

O'TWAY, (Thomas) ſon of Mr. Humphry Otway, rector of Wolbeding in Suſſex, and was born at Trottin in that county, March 3, 1651. He received his firſt education at Wickham ſchool near Wincheſter, and became a commoner of Chriſt-church in Oxford in 1669; but quitted it without a degree. Upon his arrival in London, he commenced actor, but without ſucceſs. The ſpiritedneſs of his wit and converſation, however, ſoon made him admired, and gained him the favour of Charles earl of Plymouth, who procured him a coronet's commiſſion in the new-raiſed forces deſigned for Flanders; but nature perhaps denying him that courage and reſolution ſo requiſite to form the ſoldier, he ſoon returned to England in very mean circumſtances, and exchanged the chance of reaping laurels in the field for the equally uncertain and barren laurels of the muſes. His comedy has been cenſured for too much libertiniſm; but in tragedy he has generally obſerved the decorum of the ſtage, and has cloſely followed nature in his language, and therefore ſhines in the paſſionate parts more than any of our Engliſh poets. Mr. Charles Gildon, in his laws of poetry, ſtiles Otway a poet of the firſt rank; and tells us, with great juſtice, that he was perfect maſter of the tragic paſſions, and draws them every where with ſuch delicate and natural ſimplicity, as never fails to raiſe ſtrong emotions in the ſoul. His Orphan is a ſtriking inſtance of this force; for though the tragedy is not heightened by the importance of the characters, his inimitable ſkill in repreſenting the workings of the heart, and its affections, is ſuch, that the circumſtances are great from the art of the poet, rather than from the dignity of the perſons repreſented. Venice Preſerved is ſtill a greater proof of his influence over our paſſions, and the faculty of mingling good and bad characters, and involving their fortunes, ſeems to be the diſtinguiſhed excellence of this writer. Mr. Addiſon juſtly obſerves, that Otway has founded this tragedy on ſo wrong a plot, that the greateſt characters in it are thoſe of rebels and traitors. Had the hero of this piece diſcovered the ſame good qualities in the defence of his country, that he ſhewed for its ruin and ſubverſion, the audience could not enough pity and admire him. But as he is now repreſented, we can only ſay of him what the Roman hiſtorian ſays of Catiline, that his fall had been glorious, ſi pro patriâ ſic concidiſſet, had he ſo fallen in the ſervice of his country. Great as our author's parts were, he had many enemies among his cotemporary poets, of whom Dryden was not the leaſt; who, tho' he was often heard to call Otway a barren illiterate man, yet was forced to confeſs, that he poſſeſſed a power which he wanted, viz. moving the paſſions. After ſuffering many eclipſes of fortune (chiefly owing to his own bad conduct) this excellent poet died of want at a public houſe on Tower-hill in 1685, and 33d year of his age. He was doubtleſs driven to this obſcure retreat to avoid the perſecution of his creditors; and as he durſt not appear often abroad to ſollicit aſſiſtance, and had no means of getting money, he was in the greateſt diſtreſs. Compelled by his preſſing neceſſity, Mr. Otway, whoſe delicacy would not permit him to run in debt to people nearly in the ſame circumſtances with himſelf, at laſt ventured out of his lurking place, almoſt naked, and ſhivering with cold, and went into a coffee-houſe on Tower-hill, where he ſaw a gentleman, of whom he had ſome knowledge, and of whom he ſollicited the loan of a ſhilling. The gentleman recollecting Mr. Otway, though in this extreme mean appearance, and ſhocked to ſee the author of Venice Preſerved begging, compaſſionately put into his hand a guinea. Mr. Otway, having thanked his benefactor in the moſt ſubmiſſive terms, retired, and changed the guinea to purchaſe a roll; but as his ſtomach was full of wind by long faſting, the firſt mouthful choaked him, and inſtantaneouſly put a period to his days. Thus, it is reported, Mr. Otway died.

O'XFORD, S. a city of England, and the capital of the county of the ſame name. It ſtands on a ſmall eminence on the banks of the Iſis, near its junction with the Charwell, and enjoys a healthy air. It is the ſee of a biſhop, with a celebrated univerſity; the principal officers of which are, a chancellor (always a nobleman of the firſt rank) and a vice-chancellor, who is in orders, and the head of ſome college exerciſing the chancellor's power, and governing the ſtudents, according to the ſtatutes, the conſtitution of which is remarkably regular, the diſcipline ſtrict, the endowments liberal; and, in ſhort, every thing well adapted for the education of youth: ſo that it is the principal ſeat of the muſes in Great Britain. The private buildings here are neat, and the public magnificent. The city, including the ſuburbs, is of a circular form, and about three miles in circuit; conſiſting chiefly of two principal ſtreets, which croſs each other in the center of the town. The greateſt trade of Oxford being in corn and malt, and the Iſis being navigable from hence to London, great quantities of theſe are ſent down the river to the metropolis, and receive in return coals, proviſions, &c. Here is the famous Bodleian library, in which are manuſcripts principally, all Dr. Ratcliff's library, &c. the Theatrum Sheldonianum for public ſolemnities; the Clarendon printing-houſe; the Arundelian marbles; the gallery for fine paintings; thirteen elegant pariſh churches, beſides the cathedral of Chriſtchurch-college; and twenty colleges, viz. 1. Univerſity College, founded by king Alfred. 2. Baliol, by Sir J. Baliol, father of Baliol, king of the Scots, in the reign of Henry III. 3. Merton, by lord chancellor Merton, biſhop of Rocheſter, Edward I. 4. Oriel, founded by Edward II. 5. Exeter, by Walter Stapleton, biſhop of Exeter, Edward II. 6. Queen's, by Rob. Egleſfield, B. D. Edward III. 7. New College, by William of Wickham, Edward III. 8. Lincoln, by Richard Fleming, biſhop of Lincoln, coln, Hen. VI. 9. All Souls, by H. Chicheley, archbiſhop of Canterbury, Hen. VI. 10. Magdalen, by W. Wainfleet, biſhop of Wincheſter, Hen. VI. 11. Brazen Noſe, by Smith, biſhop of Lincoln, and R. Sutton, eſq; Hen. VIII. 12. Corpus Chriſti, by R. Fox, biſhop of Wincheſter, Hen. VIII. 13. Chriſt Church, by Hen. VIII. 14. Trinity, Sir Tho. Pope, queen Mary. 15. St. John Baptiſt, by Sir Tho. White, merchant of London, queen Mary. 16. Jeſus, by queen Elizabeth. 17. Wadham, by Nic. and Dorothy Wadham, James I. 18. Pembroke, by Thomas Tiſdale, eſq; and Dr. Whitwick, James I. 19. Worceſter was formerly called Glouceſter-hall, till lately it was endowed by Sir Tho. Coke, and made collegiate. 20. Hartford, which was Hart-hall till 1740, when it was erected into a college. All theſe are endowed with fellowſhips, ſcholarſhips, &c. and moſt of them enriched with libraries, and other donations, and adorned with beautiful chapels, gardens, groves, cloiſters, quadrangles, piazzas, ſtatutes, and other ornaments. The halls, where gentlemen live at their own expence, except a few who have exhibitions or penſions, are five, viz. St. Edmund, belonging to Queen's College; Magdalen, to Magdalen College; St. Alban's, to Merton; St. Mary's, to Oriel; and New Inn, to New College. Beſides theſe colleges and halls, there are ſchools, wherein exerciſes for the ſeveral degrees are performed, public lectures read, &c. This is a ſtately pile, and was firſt built by queen Mary; but the preſent fabric was chiefly raiſed by the contribution of Sir Thomas Bodley, whoſe library here is famous throughout all Europe for its number of books, printed and manuſcript. The number of ſtudents is generally about three thouſand, two thouſand of whom live at their own charges, and about one thouſand are ſupported by the revenues of the different colleges, beſides the ſervants belonging to the colleges and halls, which have each their rules and ſtatutes for government under their reſpective heads, with fellows and tutors. There are four terms in the year for public exerciſes, lectures, and diſputations, and ſet days and hours when the profeſſors of every faculty read their lectures, and in ſome of the colleges are public lectures for all who chuſe to attend them, with proper ſalaries for the readers. Beſides the chancellor and vice-chancellor already mentioned, there is, 1. A high ſteward, named by the chancellor, and approved by the univerſity. 2. Two proctors, who are maſters of arts, and choſe yearly in turns out of the ſeveral colleges, to keep the peace and puniſh diſorders. 3. A public orator, who harangues princes and other great perſonages viſiting the univerſity. 4. A keeper of the archives. 5. A regiſter, who records all tranſactions relating to the univerſity. 6. Three ſquire-beadles, and three yeomen-beadles, who attend the vice-chancellor in public. 7. A verger, who, on ſolemn occaſions, walks with the beadles before the vice-chancellor with a ſilver rod in his hand. This may ſerve for a ſuccinct view of the univerſity; for ſhould we deſcribe the innumerable curioſities, ſuch a detail would carry us beyond the limits preſcribed in this work. The city is governed by a mayor, &c. but ſubject to the chancellor or vice-chancellor of the univerſity in all affairs of conſequence, even relating to the town: here parliaments have been frequently held; and the city gave title of earl to the family of the Veres for the ſpace of 500 years; but that family being long ſince extinct, the title was conferred by queen Anne, with the the additional title of Mortimer, on the famous treaſurer Harley, in whoſe collateral deſcendants it ſtill continues. In a ſtately tower, in the front of the college-gate, hangs the great bell called Tom, weighing near 17,000 pounds, being above ſeven feet in diameter, and near ſix feet high. It is tolled every night to give warning for ſhutting up all the gates of the colleges. The univerſity ſends two members to parliament, (a privilege given it, as alſo to Cambridge, by king James I.) and the city the like number. It lies ſixty miles S. W. of Cambridge, and fifty-W. of London.

O'XFORDSHIRE, S. is an inland county, having Buckinghamſhire on the E. Glouceſter on the W. Northamptonſhire on the N. and Warwickſhire on the S. It is forty-two miles long, and twenty-ſix broad, containing 534,000 acres, 19,700 houſes, and 120,000 inhabitants, and has one city, fifteen market-towns, 280 pariſhes, and fourteen hundreds. Its air is ſweet and healthy; and though many parts produce corn, it abounds moſtly with meadows and paſtures, and formerly the hills were well covered with woods; but being cut down in the civil wars, fuel is ſince very ſcarce. It ſends nine members to parliament, viz. two for the county, two for the city, two for the univerſity, two for New Woodſtock, and one for Banbury.

O'ZIER, S. See Oſier.

P, A conſonant; the fifteenth letter of the Engliſh alphabet; ſounded by a ſlight compreſſion of the fore part of the lips: When it comes before an b it is pronounced like f, before t it is ſometimes mute, or not ſounded, as in accompt and receipt. If we trace its form, it ſeems either to have been borrowed from the Hebrew ם, written forwards after the European manner, or elſe from the Greek Π, written with the laſt leg ſhort, as may be ſeen on ſome Roman monuments, which in courſe of time was formed round; the Gothic character ſtrongly confirms this conjecture. The Saxon capital is the ſame with that which we uſe at preſent. Uſed as a numeral letter it ſtood for 100, but with a daſh on the top thus $\overline{P}$ for 400,000. Among medical writers it ſtands for pugil, or the eighth part of a handful. In Italian muſic it ſtands for piano, or ſoft, and ſhows that the force of the voice or inſtrument is to be leſſened. P P implies piu piana, more ſoft, and P P P pianiſſimo, the ſofteſt poſſible. P. M. in aſtronomy, ſtands for poſt meridiem, or afternoon.

PARIS, [in Lat. Lutetiæ, Pariſiorum, or Pariſium] a city in the middle of the government of the iſle of France, both its capital, and alſo that of the whole kingdom. It lies in a ſpacious plain on the Seine. This is a very large, populous, and ſtately city, built of a circular form, about two Freneh leagues in diameter, and ſix in circuit, including the ſuburbs.

It is reckoned to contain 912 ſtreets, great and ſmall, and upwards of 20,000 houſes, beſides religious ſtructures, colleges, halls, and ſhops; has 52 pariſhes, 56 monaſteries inhabited by fryars, 78 by nuns, 14,000 coaches, and about 400,000 inhabitants: theſe conſume annually above 100,000 muids of corn, each muid 2600 pounds weight; 140,000 oxen or cows, 550,000 ſheep, 125,000 calves, and 40,000 hogs; 330,000 muids of wine, each equivalent to 300 of our quarts, beſides brandy, beer, and cyder.

Though Paris ſtands on more ground than London, which may be much doubted ſince the great increaſe of new buildings in the latter, it is not ſo populous, London exceeding it by at leaſt 200,000 ſouls.

The houſes of Paris are built of white hewn-ſtone, and uniform; the ſtreets are of a competent breadth, the ſoil of which is conveyed into a canal, and washed down by means of a large body of water conveyed from a neighbouring fountain.

As almost every French nobleman has a palace, or hotel as they call it, in this city, with courts and gardens belonging to it, in this respect Paris surpasses any thing of that kind to be met with in London. The Louvre, the Tuilleries, and other royal palaces here, are indeed large and spacious, but old and decayed buildings.

Paris has three capital divisions; namely, 1. The town, which lies to the N. of the Seine; 2. The city, which is entirely surrounded by the river, being in the center of all, is called L'Isle du Palais, i. e. the island of the palace, as the royal palace takes up great part of it; and, 3. The university, which lies to the S. of the Seine, together with twelve suburbs. The whole is further subdivided into twenty quartiers or wards.

Paris is the see of an archbishop, the seat of the principal part of the kingdom, and other chief courts. Here is an university and fifty-four colleges, but in only ten of these are public exercises performed. The Sorbonne is one of the finest colleges in Europe, and formerly very famous, by which name the whole university is frequently signified: but it is at present very much on the decline, on account of its civil jurisdiction, and the other privileges it formerly enjoyed, being taken from it.

Besides the royal academy of sciences, of much the same nature as our Royal Society, here is an academy for refining the French language; also academies of painting, sculpture, and architecture; with many others for the improvement of all mechanic arts and manufactures, as tapestry, mosaic works in plate, iron, steel, brass, embroidery, &c.

The principal manufactures in Paris are gold and silver stuffs, also lace of the same materials, tapestry, ribbans, linen, and glass.

The most considerable palaces in Paris are the Louvre, behind which is the Tuillieres; beyond that is a fine walk called the Queen's walk, or Le Cours de la Reine; the palace of Orleans or Luxemberg, the royal palace, with the palace where the parliament meets. Besides these, there is the Bastile, a prison for state-prisoners, and such as are taken up by lettres-de-cachet; the arsenal; the king's library; the royal physic-garden; the royal observatory; the gobelins for all sorts of manufactures; and the town-house, in the square, called the Grève.

Its principal churches are, the cathedral of Notre Dame, St. Genevieve, the abbey of St. Germain, with the church and nunnery of Valde-Grace, &c.

The first magistrate of Paris is called Prevôt des Marchands, or the Provest of merchants.

In Paris are ten bridges, the three most considerable of which are the Pont-au-Change, the Pont-neuf, and the Pont-royal.

On both sides of the Seine are very fine quays in several places: and in this city are upwards of twenty hospitals, of which the Hotel-Dieu is the largest, &c.

In the square called La Place des Victoires, is a noble statue of Lewis XIV. but very much degraded by flattering inscriptions, and the mean prostrations, &c. used formerly, even to a degree of adoration, by the Duke de la Feuillade, who erected it.

In the neighbourhood are the palaces of Versailles, Trianon, Marli, St. Germain en Laye, &c. &c.

"Paris, says Busching, is the center of all good taste and recreation." But vanity and pleasure, the other part of its character, reigning here in a superlative degree, does not seem to entitle them to any great share of the former.

PE'KING, the principal province of all China, and on the moſt northern verge of the empire, being bounded on that ſide by the great wall which parts it from Tartary. It has the province of Honan on the S. Xanſi, on the W. the bay or gulph of Vanghai, or the Yellow ſea on the E. It extends from lat. 35 to 41 deg. N.

Peking is ſubdivided into eight ſmaller provinces, each of which has a capital from which it is denominated.

The capital of the whole empire of China is Peking, and it has been the imperial ſeat for better than 300 years; but before the æra of the Tartar conqueſt, Nanking enjoyed that privilege. It lies about ſix miles S. of the famous Chineſe wall, which ſeparates China from Tartary, and has a communication, by means of the Eaſtern ſea and a large canal, with ſome of the moſt conſiderable provinces in the empire, lying 200 miles W. of the Cang ſea, a bay of the great Eaſtern ocean.

The walls of this city are about forty feet high, and flanked with towers; the circuit is about twenty miles. It conſiſts of two large cities, namely, the Tartarian and the Chineſe, beſides ſuburbs. The number of inhabitants is computed at two millions.

The principal ſtreets are 120 feet broad, and three miles long. The gates are nine, and of marble; being very high, and incloſing a large court with four ſtout walls, over which are ſtately caſtles, both on the city and the country ſide. All the ſtreets are equally crowded from the vaſt concourſe of people that reſort to the court, and the prodigious quantity of proviſions of all ſorts, beſide merchandiſe, that are pouring in from morning to night; and to this may be added the great ſtate which the Chineſe in general affect.

The emperor's palace, with the gardens, lies in the middle of the Tartar city, being a magnificent ſtructure two miles long, and fronting the S. as all public buildings in this country do, and about a mile broad. This palace is ſurrounded with two ſtout walls, the outer of a prodigious height and thickneſs. Here are no coaches, but people are carried on horſeback, or in chairs; and even tradeſmen ride in their chaiſes, both for expedition and avoiding the dirt in the ſtreets, which renders them as inconvenient in winter as the duſt does in ſummer.

The ſilks and China-ware of various kinds, which are expoſed to ſale in the ſhops before the trades-people's houſes, from one end of the ſtreet to the other, make a very grand and beautiful appearance. In their houſes they uſe ſtoves with charcoal in cold weather, having no chimneys in them. But what is moſt ſurpriſing in this vaſt metropolis, is the incredible plenty and cheapneſs of all ſorts of goods.

It ſtands in a fine, ſpacious, but ſandy plain, near the foot of the mountains, and has a numerous merous garriſon as well in the time of peace as war, beſides the ſtrong guard which is kept about the imperial palace. Lat. 40 deg. 15 min. N. long. 111 deg. 10 min. E.

PE'NSYLVANIA, one of the Britiſh colonies in North America, ſo denominated from the proprietary, Mr. Penn, who was of the people called Quakers, of which ſect there is here a majority. It lies between lat. 39 and 42 deg. N. and between long. 47 and 48 deg. W. It is bounded on the E. by Delaware river and bay, with the Atlantic ocean; on the N. and W. by Canada; and on the S. by Maryland; being about 200 miles long, and almoſt the ſame in breadth; but in ſome parts very narrow. The country is well watered, not only by the Delaware, but by other navigable rivers, which carry large ſhips up into this province. The original founder of this republic, as it were, namely, William Penn, made the moſt perfect freedom, both religious and civil, the baſis of this eſtabliſhment: ſo that there is a general toleration for all denominations of Chriſtians. The heirs of Penn, (who firſt obtained the patent for it in 1680) appoint the governor and his council; but the houſe of repreſentatives are choſen by the freemen of the province. This flouriſhing province is inhabited by upwards of 250,000 people of different religions, nations, and languages; and among theſe are numbers of Germans, Dutch, Swedes, French refugees, &c. who yet live together in great harmony; and this has alſo its due influence on the rude Indians.

In this country there are trees, cattle, and grain of all ſorts. Its trade with reſpect to Europe and America, conſiſts in horſes, pipe-ſtaves, ſalt pork, beef, and fiſh. They import in return from the Caribbee iſlands, rum, ſugar, molaſſes, ſalt, and wine; from Great-Britain, houſhold-goods, cloathing, hard-ware, tools, and toys.

If within five years after any law has paſſed in this province, the time limitted for delivering a tranſcript of it, his Majeſty does not repeal it in ſix months from the delivery of ſuch tranſcript, the crown cannot do it afterwards.

PERSIA, a vaſt empire of Aſia, lying between lat. 25 and 45 deg. N. and between long. 45 and 67 deg. E. It is upwards of 1200 miles in length, and almoſt the ſame in breadth. It is bounded on the N. by part of Ruſſia, the Caſpian ſea, and the county of the Uſbeck and independent Tartars; on the E. by the Mogul empire, from which a ridge of mountains and the Indus divide it; on the S. it has the Arabian ſea, which is a part of the ocean and the Perſian gulph; and on the W. it has Georgia and Aran, or ancient Armenia, from which the rivers Kar and Aros part it; and likewiſe the Tigris and Euphrates, which ſeparate it from the Turkiſh empire in Aſia.

Anciently Perſia comprehended, beſides ſeveral ſmaller ſtates, the three powerful nations of Media, Perſia, and Parthia. Its limits on the ſide of India have been extended further, weſtward by the late Kouli Kan, who added to Perſia all the Indian provinces on the W. ſide of the Indus: and theſe the Great Mogul confirmed to him, upon relinquiſhing, in 1739, his conqueſt of the provinces lying E. of that river.

The boundaries of Perſia, on the ſide of Turky, cannot be exactly aſcertained; for though the Tigris near its mouth forms part of the weſtern limits, the Turks and Perſians are not agreed with regard to the provinces that lie further N. on that river.

The temperature of the air in Perſia varies, according to the poſition of the different provinces. It is generally extreme hot in ſummer, as lying under the tropic of Cancer; and even the winds are ſo hot for three months in the year, that there is hardly any ſtirring abroad about noon, without endangering life: for blowing from the eaſtward over vaſt ſands, they occaſion a heat equal to that of an oven; but then theſe winds are refreſhed by cool breezes in the afternoon. This ſultrineſs is particularly found along the ſea-coaſts of the ſouthern provinces; and it often proves mortal to Europeans, particularly ſuch as are addicted to intemperance.

In Perſia they have very little water, and hardly a river large enough to carry a boat. Sometimes a traveller does not meet with water for whole days together: but no place huſbands it better than they do here; for they collect all their little ſtreams and ſprings, and turning them into one channel, direct their courſe towards their towns, cultivated fields and gardens, ſometimes for the ſpace of forty or fifty miles.

The country is very much incumbered, with mountains, ſome of which are very high, and rocks generally barren, without tree or herbage: but they have ſeveral fertile valleys, where lie their large towns; particularly the part on the Caſpian ſea cannot be exceeded by any country in fruitfulneſs: but in other regions the barrenneſs is chiefly owing to the ſcarcity of its preſent inhabitants, and likewiſe to their ſloth, for anciently there was not a more plentiful country in the world than Perſia.

Its principal produce is rice, wheat, and barley; the melons here are excellent, and in great quantities, having no leſs than twenty different ſpecies, which the common people feed on in the ſeaſon: alſo cucumbers, delicious apricots, and large peaches. They have ſeveral ſorts of wine. The palm-tree is carefully cultivated, eſpecially in the gardens, which beſides produce a great variety of roots and vegetables. Their dates are delicious, and, being laid in heaps, they candy themſelves.

The country produces rhubarb, ſenna, and many other mineral drugs; they have alſo piſtachio-nuts and other fruits.

The Perſians are more luxurious in their eating than the Turks; and make uſe of ice even in winter, but never of ſnow. A great many take opium.

The horſes of Perſia are the fineſt in all the Eaſt: their camels and dromedaries are the moſt uſeful animals for tranſporting of merchandiſe over the ſandy deſarts, ſome of them carrying near a thouſand weight, and travelling for ſeveral days without water: they have mules, oxen, buffaloes, and two ſorts of aſſes; the one ſlow and heavy, like ours, and an other light and graceful; likewiſe large flocks of ſheep and goats.

They are ſometimes viſited with locuſts, which fly ſo thick, that the ſky is darkened by them; and they deſtroy all the fruits of the earth where they alight. They have a multitude of hawks, eagles, and other birds of prey, which they teach to fly at game, and even wild beaſts, with the aſſiſtance of dogs; ſo that nothing but wild-boars eſcape them.

Their manufactures are embroidery, eſpecially gold, and ſilver, on cloth, ſilk, or leather. Silk is the ſtaple commodity of Perſia, of which they make taffeties, tabbies, ſattins, ſtuffs mixed with ſilk, cotton, camel or goats hair. Their gold velvet, eſpecially the curled ſort, is very elegant.

PO'MFRET, [the reverend Mr. John] was ſon of the reverend Mr. Pomfret, rector of Luton in Bedfordſhire, and he himſelf was preferred to the living of Malden in the ſame county. He was liberally educated at an eminent grammar ſchool in the country, from whence he was ſent to the univerſity of Cambridge, but to what college is not certain; here he wrote moſt of his poetical pieces, took the degree of maſter of arts, and very early accompliſhed himſelf in moſt kinds of polite literature. A gentleman who writes under the name of Philalethes, and who was an intimate friend of Pomfret's, has cleared his reputation from the charge of fanaticiſm, which ſome of his malicious enemies brought againſt him. It was ſhortly after his leaving the univerſity, that he was preferred to the living of Malden abovementioned, and was, ſays that gentleman, ſo far from being tinctured with fanaticiſm, that I have often heard him expreſs his abhorrence of the deſtructive tenets maintained by that people, both againſt our religious and civil rights. This imputation, it ſeems, was caſt on him by there having been one of his ſurname, though not any way related to him, a diſſenting teacher, and who publiſhed ſome rhimes upon ſpiritual ſubjects. About the year 1703, Mr. Pomfret came up to London, for inſtitution and induction, into a very conſiderable living, but was retarded for ſome time by a diſguſt taken by Dr. Henry Compton, then biſhop of London, at theſe four lines, in the cloſe of his poem entitled, The Choice.

And as I near approach'd the verge of life,
Some kind relation (for I'd have no wife)
Should take upon him all my worldly care,
While I did for a better ſtate prepare.

But the biſhop was ſoon convinced that this aſperſion againſt him, was no more than an effort of malice, as Mr Pomfret at that time was really married. The oppoſition which his enemies made to him, had, in ſome meaſure, its effect; for by the obſtructions he met with, he was obliged to ſtay longer in London than he intended, and as the ſmall pox then raged in the metropolis, he ſickened of them, and died in London, in the 36th year of his age. Mr. Pomfret publiſhed his poems in 1699, to which he has prefixed a very modeſt and ſenſible preface. His poetical compoſitions conſiſt chiefly of 1. The Choice. 2. Cruelty and Luſt, an epiſtolary eſſay, founded upon the famous ſtory which happened in the reign of king James II. Kirk, who was that prince's general againſt the duke of Monmouth, was ſolicited by a beautiful lady in behalf of her huſband, who then lay under ſentence of death. The inhuman general conſented to grant the fair petitioner her requeſt; but at no leſs a price than that of her innocence. The lady doated on her huſband, and maintained a hard ſtruggle between virtue and affection, the latter of which at laſt prevailed, and ſhe yielded to his guilty embraces. The next morning Kirk, with unparalleled brutality, deſired the lady to look out at the window of his bedchamber, when ſhe was ſtruck with the horrid ſight of her huſband upon a ſcaffold, ready to receive the blow of the executioner; and before ſhe could reach the place where he was, in order to take a laſt embrace, her huſband was no more. 3. Several epiſtles to his friends under affliction; 4. Upon the divine attributes; 5. A proſpect of death; 6. Upon the general conflagration, and the enſuing judgment. There were two pieces of our author's publiſhed after his death by his friend Philalethes; the firſt of theſe entitled Reaſon; the other is entitled Dies Noviſſima, or the laſt epiphany, a pindaric ode on Chriſt's ſecond appearance to judge the world. This is all the account we are favoured with of the life and writings of Mr. Pomfret; a man not deſtitute either of erudition or genius, of unexceptionable morals, though expoſed to the malice of antagoniſts. As he was a prudent man, and educated to a profeſſion, he was not ſubject to the uſual neceſſities of the poets, but his ſphere being ſomewhat obſcure, and his life unactive, there are few incidents recorded concerning him.

POPE, S. [papa, Lat.] the biſhop of Rome, who claims ſovereign power over all eccleſiaſtics and civil governors, as being the vicegerent of GOD; the immediate ſucceſſor of St. Peter; endowed with infallibility, and inveſted with the keys of heaven and hell. A fiſh, likewiſe called a ruff, reſembling a perch in ſhape, but never grows bigger than a gudgeon.

POPE, [Alexander] deſcended of a good family by both his parents, born June 8, 1688, in London, where his father was then a conſiderable merchant. He was taught to read very early by an aunt, and learned to write without any aſſiſtance, by copying printed books, which he executed with great neatneſs and exactneſs. The family being of the Romiſh religion, he was put, at 8 years of age, under the direction of one Taverner, a prieſt, who taught him the rudiments of the Latin and Greek tongues together. He imbibed theſe elements of claſſical learning with the greateſt facility, and the firſt ſight of the poets diſcovered at once both the peculiar bent of his inclination, and the excellency of his genius. About this time acceidentally meeting with Ogilby's tranſlation of Homer, he was ſo much ſtruck with the force of the ſtory, that notwithſtanding the badneſs of the verſification, Ogilby became a favourite book. The Ovid of Sandy's fell next in his way, and it is ſaid, that the raptures theſe tranſlations gave him were ſo ſtrong, that he ſpoke of them with pleaſure all his life after. From this private tutor he was ſent to a popiſh ſeminary at Twyford, near Wincheſter, whence he was removed to a ſchool at Hyde-park-corner. He was now about ten years of age, and being carried ſometimes to the play-houſe, the ſight of thoſe theatrical repreſentations put him upon turning the chief events in Homer into a kind of play, made up of a number of ſpeeches from Ogilby's tranſlation, connected by verſes of his own. He perſuaded the upper boys to act this piece; the maſter's gardiner repreſented the character of Ajax, and the actors were dreſſed after the prints of his favourite Ogilby, which indeed make the beſt part of that book, being being deſigned and engraved by artiſts of note. In the mean time, he was ſo unfortunate as to loſe, under his two laſt maſters, what he had acquired under the firſt. In this condition, at 12 years of age, he retired with his parents to Binfield, in Windſor-Foreſt, and, at his firſt coming, 'tis ſaid, was put under another prieſt for a few months, but with as little ſucceſs as before; ſo that he reſolved to become his own maſter. This country retreat, however, ſuited his melancholy and reflective temper; and it was about this time that he wrote his Ode on ſolitude, which appears as the firſt-fruits of his poetical genius. It was here too that he firſt peruſed the writings of Waller, of Spencer, and of Dryden. But on the firſt ſight of Dryden he abandoned the reſt, having now found an author whoſe caſt was extremely congenial with his own. His works he ſtudied with equal pleaſure and attention; placed them before his eyes as a model: In ſhort, he copied not only his harmonious verſification, but the very turns of his periods. And hence it was that he became enabled to give to rhyme all the harmony of which it is capable. Binfield being near Eaſt-Hampſtead, where Sir William Trumbull then reſided, our young genius was introduced into the acquaintance of that gentleman, who being ſtruck with admiration at his extraordinary parts, and pleaſed with his good ſenſe, gave him great encouragement. In the mean time, maſter Pope was not wanting to himſelf, in improving his talents for poetry. At 14 years old he had compoſed ſeveral elegant pieces. At 15 he had acquired a ready habit in the two learned languages, to which he ſoon after added French and Italian. He now thought himſelf able to undertake an epic poem, and ſet about writing his Alcander this year; but the performance, as might be expected, was a glaring proof of childiſh folly. However, he had ſenſe and modeſty enough to keep it in his ſtudy; and in his riper years ſpoke of it with frankneſs and ingenuity, than does more than atone for the forwardneſs of his attempt. And the following year, 1704, he entered upon a taſk more ſuitable to his age, his Paſtorals, which brought him into the acquaintance of ſome of the moſt eminent wits of that time. He communicated theſe firſt to Mr. Wycherley, who was highly pleaſed with them, and ſent a copy of them to Mr. Walſh. This introduced him into the acquaintance of that gentleman, who proved a very ſincere friend to him, and having immediately diſcerned that our poet's chief talent lay, not ſo much in ſtriking out new thoughts of his own, as improving thoſe which he borrowed from the ancients, and an eaſy verſification, told him, among other things, that there was one way left open for him to excel his predeceſſors, and that was correctneſs; obſerving, that though we had ſeveral great poets, yet none of them were correct; he therefore adviſed him to make that his ſtudy. The advice was not loſt: Mr. Pope received it very gratefully, and obſerved it very diligently. This year, 1704, he wrote alſo the firſt part of his Windſor Foreſt, though the whole was not publiſhed till 1710, with a dedication to lord Lanſdown, whom he mentions as one of his earlieſt acquaintance. Mr. Wycherley was another. To theſe, beſides Bolingbroke and Walſh, he adds Congreve, Garth, Swift, Talbot, Somers, and Sheffield, as perſons with whom he was not only converſant, but beloved. At the age of 18, he was grown ſo high in the eſteem of Mr. Wycherley, that he thought him capable of correcting his poems which had been damned, ſo as they might appear again in print. Pope complied with the requeſt, and executed it with equal freedom and judgment. But the faults proved too many for the author of them to be told of; he was old, became jealous, and conſtrued his young maſter's ingenuity and plain-dealing, into want of reſpect. Not only the deſign of publiſhing was dropt, but all correſpondence with the corrector ſuſpended. This ungenerous return was lively reſented by Mr. Pope. And though Wycherley was prevailed with afterwards, by the mediation of a common friend, to reſume the correſpondence, yet this went no further than bare complaiſance. However, ſome time after Mr. Wycherley's death, his poems being re-publiſhed by ſome mercenary hand, 1728, our author in the following year printed ſeveral letters that had paſſed between them, in vindication of Mr. Wycherley's good name, againſt ſome miſconſtructions prefixed to that edition. Our poet's conduct, throughout this whole trying affair, was greatly above his years. His Eſſay on criticiſm, though wrote ſo early as 1708, yet placed him among thoſe of the firſt rank in his art. He was not yet 20 years old, ſo that every body ſtood amazed to find ſuch a knowledge of the world, ſuch a maturity of judgment, and ſuch a penetration into human nature, as are there diſplayed; inſomuch that it became a ſubject for the criticks to diſplay their profoundeſt ſkill in accounting for it. Mr. Pope's genius ripening thus early, was owing, 'tis ſaid, to a happy conjuncture of concurring circumſtances. He was happily ſecured from falling into the debaucheries of women and wine, (the too frequent bane of hopeful youth) by the weakneſs and delicacy of his conſtitution, and the bad ſtate of his health. The ſenſual vices were too violent for ſo tender a frame, he never fell into intemperance or diſſipation, which is of the greateſt conſequence in preſerving the faculties of the mind in due vigour. But how triumphant ſoever may be the merit of The eſſay on criticiſm, yet it was ſtill ſurpaſſed in a poetical view by The rape of the lock. This poem took its birth from an incidental quarrel that happened between the two noble families of lord Petre and Mrs. Fermor, both of our author's acquaintance, and of the ſame religion. His lordſhip, in a party of pleaſure, carried it ſo far, as to cut off a favourite lock of the lady's hair. This, though done in a way of gallantry, was ſeriouſly reſented, as being indeed a real injury. Hence there preſently grew mutual animoſities, which being ſeen with concern by a common friend to all; that friend requeſted Pope to try the power of his muſe on the occaſion, intimating that a proper piece of ridicule was the likelieſt means to extinguiſh the riſing flame. Pope readily complied; and the juncture requiring diſpatch, his firſt deſign was compleated in leſs than a fortnight, which being ſent to the lady, had more than the propoſed effect. Pleaſed to the higheſt degree with the delicacy of the compliment paid to her, ſhe firſt communicated copies of it to her acquaintance, and then prevailed with our author to print it; as he did, though not without the caution of concealing his name to ſo haſty a ſketch. But the univerſal applauſe which the ſketch met with, put him upon enriching it with the machinery of the Sylphs; and in that new dreſs the two canto's extended to five, came out the following year 1712, uſhered by a letter to Mrs. Fermor; to whom he afterwards addreſſed another, which is eſteemed far ſuperior to any of Voiture. This year he publiſhed his Temple of fame, having, according to his uſual caution, kept it two years in his ſtudy. That object of the univerſal paſſion, was full upon his thoughts at that time. He had been from the firſt ſetting out in full ſtretch after it, and ſaw it now within his reach; accordingly we find him in high ſpirits, diverting himſelf with the ladies, to one of whom he ſent a copy of his Temple, with an humorous epigram; by the letter which accompanied this, it appears, that he had now began to tranſlate Homer's Iliad, and made a great progreſs in it, and in 1713, he gave out propoſals for publiſhing that tranſlation by ſubſcription. He had been preſſed to this undertaking ſome years before by ſome of his friends, and was now greatly encouraged in the deſign by others. And the ſucceſs was ſuch, as muſt needs anſwer, if not exceed his moſt ſanguine expectation; he acquired a conſiderable fortune by a noble ſubſcription, that did honour to the kingdom. He ſaw all parties and denominations join in it, notwithſtanding the underhanded practices of ſome pretended friends, who in vain oppoſed the ſtream: at the head of which was found Mr. Addiſon. Our author had long an awful veneration for that rival, the conſciouſneſs of which, ſerved to ſet a keener edge upon his reſentment now; but though the ſenſe of ſo much treachery and falſeneſs tingled in every vein, yet he managed it with the niceſt prudence, and at laſt revenged it by a ſatire, which does honour to himſelf. Thus with admirable temper and ſpirit he preſerved his dignity; and keeping his mind attentive to every means that might render his tranſlation more perfect, he took a journey, a little before the death of queen Anne, to Oxford, to conſult ſome books in the Bodleian and other libraries there; and the firſt part of his propoſal was delivered to the ſubſcribers the following year. His finances were now put into ſuch a flouriſhing ſtate, that he reſolved to place himſelf nearer his friends in the capital; in that view, the ſmall affair at Binfield being ſold, he purchaſed a houſe at Twickenham, whither he removed with his father and mother before the expiration of this year. His father ſurvived this removal only two years. He was buried at Twickenham, and his ſon erected a monument to his memory, with an inſcription celebrating his innocence, probity, and piety. As the old gentleman was a roman catholic, he could not purchaſe, not put his money to intereſt on real ſecurity, and as he adhered to the intereſt of king James, he made it a point of conſcience, not to lend it to the new government; ſo that though he was worth near 20,000 pounds when he left off buſineſs, from the ſame principles at the revolution; yet afterwards living upon the ſtock, he left our poet to the management of ſo narrow a fortune, that any one falſe ſtep would have been fatal. In 1717, Mr. Pope publiſhed a collection of all his poetical pieces; he gave his edition of Shakeſpear in 1721. The Iliad being finiſhed, he undertook the Odyſſey. And that work being compleated in 1725, the following year was employed, in concert with his aſſociates, dean Swift and doctor Arbuthnot, in printing ſeveral volumes of miſcellanies. About this time he narrowly eſcaped loſing his life, as he was returning home in a friend's chariot; which, on paſſing a bridge, happened to be overturned, and thrown with the horſes into the river: the glaſſes were up, and he not able to break them; ſo that he was in immediate danger of drowning, when the poſtillion, who had juſt recovered himſelf, came to his relief, broke the glaſs which was uppermoſt, took him out, and carried him to the bank; but a fragment of the broken glaſs cut one of his hands ſo deſperately that he loſt the uſe of two of his fingers. His ſatire of the Dunciad came out in 1727. Our poet had bore the inſults of his enemies full ten years before he hazarded a general battle; but was all that while climbing the hill of Parnaſſus, during which, he could not forbear ſome ſlight ſkirmiſhes, and the ſucceſs of theſe was of uſe, in ſhewing him his ſuperior ſtrength and thereby adding confidence to his courage; but he was now ſeated ſafely on the ſummit. Beſides, he had obtained, what in his own opinion is the happieſt end of life, the love of valuable men; the next felicity he declared was to get rid of fools and ſcoundrels; and to that end, he ſuddenly fell upon them with his irreſiſtible pen. The poem cautiouſly made its firſt appearance as a maſked battery in Ireland; nor, indeed, was the triumph compleated without the aſſiſtance of our author's undoubted ſecond, dean Swift. It made a new appearance, printed at London, in 1728. The edition was preſented to the king and queen by Sir Robert Walpole. In 1729, by the advice of lord Bolingbroke, he turned his pen to ſubjects of morality, and accordingly we find him with the aſſiſtance of that friend, at work the year upon his Eſſay on man. His Ethic epiſtles came out ſeparately in the courſe of the two following following years. The clamour raiſed againſt one of theſe, put him upon writing ſatires, in which he ventured to attack the characters of ſome perſons of high rank. The affront was reſented in ſuch a manner, as provoked him to let looſe the whole fury of his ſatirical rage againſt them, which was poured forth in proſe and verſe. After this he continued writing ſatires till the year 1739, when he entertained ſome thoughts of undertaking an epic poem; which, however, proved abortive. In the interim, ſeveral of his familiar letters having ſtole into public, without his privity, he publiſhed a genuine collection of them in 1737. About this time he fell into the acquaintance of the preſent biſhop of Glouceſter, (then Mr. Warburton) who had publiſhed a vindication of the Eſſay on Man, againſt Mr. Crouſaz, a French writer; and that poem was publiſhed in 1740, with his learned friend's commentary. In 1742, our author added a fourth book to the Dunciad; and in the year after, his whole poem came out together, as a ſpecimen of a more correct edition of his works, which he had then reſolved to give the public, but did not live to complete this deſign. He laboured under great deformity of perſon, and had all his life been ſubject to an habitual headach: that hereditary complaint was now greatly increaſed by a dropſy in his breaſt, under which he expired, May 30, 1744, in the 56th year of his age. His body was depoſited purſuant to his own requeſt, in the ſame vault with thoſe of his parents. Lord Orrery, now lord Cork, obſerves, "that if we may judge "of him by his works, his chief aim was to "be eſteemed a man of virtue: his letters are "written in that ſtile; his laſt volumes are "all of the moral kind. His proſe writings "are little leſs harmonious than his verſe; and "his voice, in common converſation, was ſo "naturally muſical, that Southern uſed to call "him the little nightingale. His manners "were delicate, eaſy, and engaging; and he "treated his friends with a politeneſs that "charmed, and a generoſity that was much "to his honour. Every gueſt was made happy "within his doors, pleaſure dwelt under his "roof, and elegance preſided at his table." Mr. Pope bequeathed a little before his death, to Dr. Warburton, the property of all ſuch of his works then printed, as he had written, or ſhould write, commentaries upon, and had not been otherwiſe diſpoſed of or alienated.

PO'RTO BELLO, or St. PHILIP DE PORTO BELLO, a town of Darien, on Terra Firma Proper, on the narroweſt part of the iſthmus, which joins North and South America. Here is a large commodious harbour, from its extent and ſecurity denominated the Fine Harbour by Chriſtopher Columbus. It has good anchorage and ſhelter for ſhipping; and, though its entrance is very wide, it is well-defended by Iron caſtle, which ſtands on the N. point thereof. The S. ſide is full of riffs and rocks, the middle of the channel has from nine or ten to fifteen fathom water, and a good bottom. On the S. ſide of the harbour is Gloria caſtle, to the Eaſt of which begins the town, having before it a point of land which projects into the harbour. On this point ſtood fort St. Jerom. All theſe were demoliſhed in 1739, by admiral Vernon and commodore Brown, who took this town and port with ſix ſhips only. North-weſt of Gloria caſtle is the anchoring-place for large ſhips; but ſmaller veſſels come further up; and 150 toiſes from St. Jerom's fort W. 1-4th N. is a ſand bank, on which is only a fathom and a half of water.

PO'RTRESS, S. a female that has the charge of a door.

PO'RTUGAL, the Roman Luſitania, a kingdom in Europe, which is bounded northwards by Galicia, in Spain, and divided from it by the river Minho next the ſea, and by ſome ſmall rivers and hills further inland towards the E. The W. and S. ſides are waſhed by the Atlantic ocean, including the little kingdom of Algarve on the S. And on the W. the river Guadiana parts the laſt-mentioned kingdom from Andaluſia; whence drawing a line northwards, Portugal confines on Andaluſia, Spaniſh Eſtramadura, and Leon. Its whole extent from N. to S. is about 300 miles, that is, from lat. 37 to 42 deg. N. and 118 in breadth from E. to W. namely, about the middle; which is from long. 7 to 9 deg. W. and where narroweſt next Algarve, about 60. This kingdom of Portugal has ſtood now above 600 years, in a ſucceſſion of 24 princes; the firſt of which, Alphonſo, began his reign 1140. Its monarchs are abſolute at home, and own no ſuperior abroad: in both their power is deſpotic, and their will the only law. The Portugueſe tugueſe dominions abroad were formerly very extenſive and rich, but they have been very much curtailed by the Dutch. They ſtill, however, poſſeſs in America the vaſt province of Braſil, being ſo in length along the ſea, though extremely narrow towards the inland. The produce and profits of it are reckoned very conſiderable in ſugar, tobacco, ginger, cotton, indigo, hides, and dyers-wood, &c. They have alſo the Azores or Tercera iſlands, and that of Maderia W. of Portugal: in Africa the Cape Verd iſlands, the fort of Marzageo, on the coaſts of Barbary; Mina and Arquin on thoſe of Guiney, with ſeveral more on the coaſts of Congo and Angola; Mozambique on thoſe of Zanguebar: and in Aſia, Goa, Diu, Daman and Chaul, on thoſe of Tonquebar; and on the coaſt of China the town of Macao; but this laſt, though moſtly inhabited by Portugueſe, is entirely ſubject to the Chineſe.

PO'RY, Adj. [from pore] full of pores.

PO'RTSMOUTH, S. a mayor-town and ſea-port town of Hampſhire. It is the key of England on that ſide, and a regular fortification, at the entrance of a creek of Portſey iſland, which is about fourteen miles in circuit, and rounded at high tides by the ſea water, of which ſalt is made here; alſo joined to the continent by a bridge, where was anciently a ſmall caſtle and town called Port Perus or Portcheſter, at which Veſpaſian landed: it lay at the upper end of the creek, but upon the retiring of the ſea, the inhabitants followed it; and this gave riſe to the building of the preſent town. Here is one of the principal chambers for building and laying up the royal navy, being furniſhed with wet and dry docks, and vaſt magazines of naval and military ſtores, &c. It has a good counterſcarpe and double moat, with ravelines in the ditch, double paliſadoes and works for covering the place where moſt acceſſible. The town is ſtrong on the land ſide, by the fortifications round the docks and yards; beſides more ground has been lately purchaſed for additional works. The leaſt number of men continually employed in the yard is 1000; which number is greatly increaſed in time of war. In ſhort, the docks and yards are a kind of marine corporation within themſelves. The ſite of Portſmouth is low, and ſo full of water and ditches as to be reckoned aguiſh. The ſtreets are not over clean, and conſequently the effluvia not very ſavoury; but the continual reſort of ſeamen, ſoldiers, &c. render it always full of people. The inns and taverns are perpetually crowded; but the landlords bills are not the moſt moderate. The place is in want of freſh water; and though ſituated in a plentiful country, yet the great conſumption makes all ſorts of proviſions dear; as are alſo lodgings and fuel. Here is a garriſon and deputy-governor. The town ſends two members to parliament. The church is large and fair. From the watch houſe on the top of the ſteeple is a fine proſpect of the harbour, as well as of Spithead, where ſhips ride before they come in, lying between Portſmouth and the iſle of Wight. Here is a fine new quay for laying up cannon. A thouſand ſail of ſhips may ride ſafe in the harbour, the mouth of which, not ſo broad as the Thames at Weſtminſter, is ſecured on Goſport ſide by four forts, and a platform of above twenty great guns level with the water, and on the other ſide by Southſea caſtle. The markets here are on Tueſday, Thurſday, and Saturday, with a fair on July 10, for ſhoemakers, hatters, milliners, mercers, cuttlers, cabinet-makers, linen and woollen-drapers, ſilverſmiths, apparel ready made, and bed-furniture, &c. On the adjoining heath a ſuburb has been built, which for number of inhabitants and beauty of the houſes, is like to outſtrip the town itſelf: here the ſailors are entertained by the ladies of pleaſure, as they are at Amſterdam, &c. and is independent of the garriſon. Portſmouth gave title of ducheſs to King Charles IId's favourite miſtreſs Louiſa de Querouaille. It lies twenty miles S. of Wincheſter, and ſeventy-two S. W. of London. Lat. 50 deg. 48 min. N. long. 1 deg. 6 min. W.

PRIOR, S. [prieur, Fr.] the head of a convent, next in dignity to an abbot.

PRI'OR, [Matthew] celebrated for the eaſy humour and elegant taſte of his poetical writings; his father, Mr. George Prior, was a reputable citizen and joyner, in London, where Matthew was born, July 21, 1664. Our author was very young when his father died, and was committed by him to the care of his brother, a vintner at Charing-Croſs, who diſcharged this truſt with paternal tenderneſs, and at a proper age, ſent him to Weſtminſter ſchool, under the care of Dr. Buſby; where he ſoon diſtinguiſhed himſelf above his former ſchool-fellows. But he was too ſoon taken home by his uncle, to breed him to his own buſineſs. He ſtill found time to indulge the bent of his inclination to claſſical learning; in which Horace was the author that ſtruck his fancy moſt. He was ſoon taken notice of by ſome polite company that uſed his uncle's houſe; among whom was the earl of Dorſet; who being there one day with ſeveral other gentlemen of rank, the diſcourſe happened to turn upon a paſſage in an ode of Horace, and the company being divided in their ſentiments, one of the gentlemen ſaid, there is, if I am not miſtaken, a young fellow in the houſe, who is able to ſet us right; and naming Matt. Prior, he was immediately ſent for; and being deſired to give his opinion of Horace's meaning on the ode under debate, he did it with ſuch an ingenious modeſty, and ſo much to the ſatisfaction of the company, that the earl of Dorſet, from from that moment, determined to remove him from the buſineſs of a tavern, into a way of life, for which he was ſo admirably qualified: and, accordingly procured him to be ſent to St. John's college in Cambridge, where he very generouſly helped to ſupport him in a handſome manner. He was admitted 1682, and proceeding A. B. 1686, was ſhortly after choſen a fellow of the college. During his reſidence there, he contracted an intimacy with Charles Montague, of Trinity-college in the ſame univerſity; and Mr. Dryden having publiſhed this year, his poem, called, The hind and panther, Prior joined with Mr. Montague in writing The hind and panther tranſverſed, to the ſtory of the country mouſe and the city mouſe, publiſhed, 1687. The next year Mr. Prior wrote his Ode upon the neceſſary exiſtence of the Deity, for an exerciſe at the college. He was now become the admiration and delight of Cambridge; but however could not think of ſpending his life in that unactive retreat. Having ſome friends at court, he went to London, 1689, and immediately applied to his friend Fleetwood Sheppard, eſq; with an addreſs that was drawn up peculiar to himſelf, and irreſiſtibly engaging. Accordingly, at the ſolicitation of that gentleman, he was introduced, by the earl of Dorſet, to the court; and, 1690, their majeſties appointed him ſecretary on the part of the Engliſh, in the congreſs at the Hague; the earls of Pembroke and Portland, together with the lord Durſley, (afterwards earl of Berkley) being ambaſſadors and plenipotentiaries. As this was an almoſt unexampled ſplendid aſſembly, in which too an affair of the laſt importance was under conſideration, it gave Mr. Prior an opportunity of exerting all his talents for buſineſs, and he acquitted himſelf therein, ſo much to the ſatisfaction of his royal maſter, that, in the reſolution to keep him near his perſon, he appointed him a gentleman of his bedchamber. This ſituation giving him leiſure to indulge his genius, he compoſed ſeveral ſmall pieces of poetry, and gladly embraced every occaſion, that the events of the war offered, of making his poetical talents ſerviceable to the honour of his country. Upon the firſt reſolution moved towards ſettling a peace, 1696, he was again employed in the poſt of ſecretary to the Engliſh negociations, at the treaty of Ryſwick, 1697, having been nominated the ſame year principal ſecretary of ſtate in Ireland. In 1698 he went ſecretary to the embaſſy to France, in in which poſt he continued during the ſucceſſive embaſſies of the two earls of Portland and Jerſey; he had not been long in France, when one of the officers of the French king's houſhold, ſhewing him the royal apartments and curioſities of Verſailles, pointed in a particular manner to the victories of Lewis XIV, painted by Le Brun; and aſking, "Whether king Wil-"liam's actions were to be ſeen alſo in his "palace." "No, Sir, (anſwered the Eng-"liſh ſecretary) the monuments of my maſter's "actions are to be ſeen every where but in his "own houſe." He did not leave Paris till ſome time after the arrival of the third ambaſſador there from England, the earl of Manchester, to whom he was of ſingular ſervice. For though the powers of his royal commiſſion were now ſuperſeded, yet his perſonal qualities had rendered him ſo much the delight of the French monarch, that he was ſtill particularly powerful in that court. About the middle of Auguſt, 1699, he went thence to king William at Loo in Holland; whence, after a long and very particular audience of his majeſty, he departed with his orders by the way of the Hague for England, where he arrived about the middle of October, and immediately took poſſeſſion of the under ſecretary's ſeat, in the office of the earl of Jerſey. But he had not been many days in this new employment, before he was ordered back to Paris, to aſſiſt the ambaſſador, with his intereſt in that king, upon the affair of the partition treaty. He diſpatched this buſineſs to the entire ſatisfaction of both the ſovereigns, and returned to London with the quickneſs of a courier. This ſame year, in Chriſtmas holidays, he printed his celebrated poem, called, Carmen ſeculare. In the midſt of theſe concerns for the public welfare, an opportunity was given him, in the year 1700, of teſtifying his dutiful regard for the reputation of the univerſity, which he fulfilled with all imaginable alacrity; and that learned body, the ſame year, with equal gladneſs, executed the king's mandamus, in conferring upon him the degree of M. A. The earl of Jerſey accepting the poſt of lord chamberlain this year, our under ſecretary's place became void; but it was not long before he obtained another the ſame year, which was more agreeable to his humour; for upon Mr. Locke's reſigning his ſeat at the board of trade on account of his ill ſtate of health, Mr. Prior was appointed to ſucceed him; and was elected a repreſentative for Eaſt-Grinſtead, in Suſſex, in the new parliament, which met in February, 1700-1, where he voted for impeaching the ſeveral lords, charged with adviſing the partition treaty. Upon queen Anne's acceſſion to the throne, a war breaking out again with France, our author, conſtantly zealous in his country's cauſe, exerted again his poetical talents in her honour; firſt, in that inimitable letter of his to monſieur Beauleau Deſpreaux, occaſioned by the victory at Blenheim, 1704; and again, in his Ode, humbly inſcribed to the queen, on the glorious ſucceſs of her majeſty's arms, 1706. But as ſoon as he thought the general was too much influenced by private views to prolong the war, he honeſtly concurred with the inclination of his ſovereign, for peace; and, 1710, he joined with ſome of the brighteſt wits in the nation, in writing the Examiner: where the part of the general's conduct was ſeverely handled. In 1711, when the queen determined to treat with France, ſhe pitched upon Mr. Prior to carry her demands toward a pacification; for which purpoſe, he was appointed her majeſty's miniſter plenipotentiary

that court; having been made one of the commiſſioners of the cuſtoms a little before. He made all the neceſſary diſpatch which this affair required, and returned in a few weeks to London, accompanied with the French miniſter, Mr. Meſnager, who was furniſhed by his maſter with full powers to ſign preliminaries; and ſome of the meetings in this negociation were held at Mr. Prior's houſe; who, by the common requeſt of all the committee of the privy council, intruſted in this matter, was joined with them in the commiſſion to ſign the articles after the agreement on the part of her majeſty, who was likewiſe inclined to join him with the two miniſters at Utrecht, to take care of commercial affairs; but the high ſpirit of the earl of Strafford having poſitively refuſed to be joined in commiſſion with a perſon of ſo mean an extraction, and threatening to lay down his employment, the buſineſs of trade was committed to the lord privy-ſeal. However, he was ſent again, on the 1ſt of Auguſt, 1712, to France, in order to accommodate ſuch matters as then remained unſettled in the congreſs of Utrecht. From the end of this month, he had the appointments and authority of an ambaſſador; and though he did not aſſume the public character, till after the duke of Shrewſbury's departure, yet the burthen of the embaſſy lay upon him during his grace's ſtay, who rather gave a ſanction to it, by his high quality, than contributed to the diſpatch of the negociations. In the latter end of October he was ſent to England upon an affair of great importance, with a credential letter from the French king to the queen, and returned with her majeſty's anſwer about the middle of November. Theſe letters are remarkable proofs of his being in the higheſt favor at both courts; and he was continued in the poſt of her majeſty's ambaſſador and plenipotentiary; in the former as long as ſhe lived. He remained at Paris alſo in the character of a public miniſter ſome months after the acceſſion of king George I. at whoſe appointment he was ſucceeded by the earl of Stair, who, purſuant to his directions, took poſſeſſion of all his predeceſſor's papers. The great change that happened in the public management of affairs at this time, occaſioned Mr. Prior to be detained in France, without any public character; and, upon his arrival in England, on March 25, 1715, he was immediately taken up by an order of the houſe of commons, and committed to the hands of a meſſenger. On April 1, following, he underwent a ſtrict examination, before a a committee of the privy-council; and at the concluſion of it was removed from his own houſe, where he had continued till then, and laid under a ſtricter confinement in that of the meſſenger's. Upon the 10th of June, following, Robert Walpole, eſq; (afterwards earl of Orford) moved the houſe of commons for an impeachment againſt him; and on the 17th he was ordered into cloſe cuſtody, and no perſon to be admitted to ſee him, without leave from the ſpeaker; and, 1717, when the act of grace was paſſed, Mr. Prior, who lay ſtill at the mercy of the houſe of commons, was one of the perſons excepted out of it. Notwithſtanding this, he was ſoon after diſcharged, without any further proſecution, or being called to a trial. He wrote an account of the proceedings in his examination before the committee of council, which, together with the ill-uſage he thought he had met with in the ſecret committee of the houſe of commons, occaſioned him to undertake a defence of himſelf and the miniſtry, in the four laſt years of queen Anne's reign, in anſwer to the charge alledged againſt them in that report. He ſpent the remainder of his days, retired from buſineſs, in the company of his muſe, being ſettled at Down-Hall, a ſmall village in the county of Eſſex; which, by the generoſity of Robert Harley, earl of Oxford, he was poſſeſſed of for his life. Having finiſhed his Solomon on the vanity of the world, he made a collection of all his poems, and publiſhed them by ſubſcription in one volume folio, with a moſt elegant dedication to the duke of Dorſet, as a greatful memorial of his father's patronage of the author. Some time after this, he formed a deſign of writing a hiſtory of his own time; which, conſidering the part he bore himſelf in many national tranſactions, the opportunities, he had of being well informed concerning others, added to the extraordinary talents he poſſeſſed of every part of fine literature, could hardly fail of being a very valuable work; but he had made very little progreſs in it; when a lingering fever put a period to his work and to his life, September the eighteenth, 1721, in the fifty eighth year of his age; he died at Wimple, a ſeat of the earl of Oxford, ſon to the lord-treaſurer, not far from Cambridge; and his corps was intered, according to his own directions, in Weſtminſter-abbey, where a ſtately monument is erected to his memory, for which laſt piece of human vanity, he ſet a-part 500 l. by his will; beſides a buſt of himſelf, done by Coriveaux, exquiſitely performed, and ſtands at the top of his monument; the inſcription beneath being wrote by Dr. Robert Friend, then head maſter of Weſtminſter-ſchool. After his death, another ſmall collection of his poems was publiſhed; and ſince that, there came out a piece in 1740, entitled, the hiſtory of his own time, compiled from the original manuſcripts of his late excellency Matthew Prior, eſq. and ſome poems in a ſeparate volume. Notwithſtanding the many high poſts and lucrative employments, which he had enjoyed in the courſe of his life, he died at laſt fellow of St. John's college in Cambridge, which was the only preferment he was then poſſeſſed of. We have the following ſtory concerning this part of his conduct, that after he became a miniſter of ſtate, he was often told, that a fellowſhip was too trifling an affair for him to keep; particularly when he was made ambaſſador, ſome perſons intimated to him, that the fellowſhip was hardly conſiſtent ſiſtent with that character; but he replied, 'That every thing he had beſides was precarious, and when all failed, that would 'be bread and cheeſe, at leaſt, and therefore 'he did not mean to reſign it.'' However, he made amends for his humour in his will, where he left the college a ſet of books, to the value of 200 l. to be choſen out of his ſtudy by that ſociety; as alſo his own picture, and another of the earl of Jerſey. In purſuance whereof, all the books, which are in very magnificient bindings, are placed in the college-library, all together in one deſk, which they fill, and over it is ſet the benefactor's picture, done by La Belle in France; it is at full length, in a ſitting poſture, very richly dreſſed, en embaſſadeur, and finely painted; and is ſaid to have been a preſent to Mr. Prior by Lewis XIV. who gave the painter 100 piſtoles for it.

QUEBEC, the capital of the province of Sanguenay, and of all Canada, in North America; alſo the ſee of a biſhop. It lies at the junction of the river St. Laurence and St. Charles or the little river, and on the N. ſide of the former, being about 140 leagues diſtant from the ſea. It has a large haven, capable of containing 100 ſhips of the line. Here the river St. Laurence ſhrinks from a breadth of four Leagues to that of a ſingle mile: and hence the reaſon of the name of town. Below the town is a caſcade called the Leap of Montmorency, and at the entrance of the little channel of the Iſle of Orleans ſaid to be forty foot high, and thirty broad, though cauſed by an inconſiderable brook. A little above this is the city; but between that and the Iſle of Orleans is a baſon a full league every way, into which the river St. Charles empties itſelf from the N. W. ſo that Quebec ſtands between the mouth of that river and Cape Diamant. At the firſt building of the town in 1608, the tide came quite up to it; but ſince that the river hath ſunk and left a dry large ſpot on which the lower town is built, at the foot of a rocky mountain, and eight fathom high. This is moſtly inhabited by merchants, but is too much crowded, and defended by a platform about the middle, level with the water, and commanding all veſſels that go and come. The way from the lower town to the higher is ſteep. This laſt has noble edifices, as churches palaces, &c. eſpecially the houſe of the Knights Hoſpitallers, a ſtone building, with two ſtately pavillions, and ſaid to have coſt 40,000 livres, but unfiniſhed. The cathedral, which is clumſey, and in a mean ſtyle, has a large, high, and well-built tower, ſeen at a great diſtance. This is the reſidence of the Vice-roy of Canada, who ſtiles himſelf Governor and Captain General of New France and Louiſiana, with a ſalary of about 12,000 crowns beſides preſents, perquiſites, &c. Beſides the lower and higher towns, there is another beyond the latter, on the banks of the river St. Charles, along which there are ſeveral noble country-ſeats, &c. Quebec has a caſtle on the brow of a hill, about forty fathom above the town, but irregularly built, and fortified with only two baſtions, and no ditch towards the town, the garriſon being inconſiderable. It has alſo another fort on Cape Diamant, a ſolid rock, which is 400 fathom high, with only ſome few works and redoubts commanding both it and the town: but the place owes its ſtrength more to nature than art; and yet it ſeems not to be very tenable. About the middle of the year 1760 the Britiſh troops under General Wolfe, though with the loſs of that gallant young officer in the beginning of the action, took this place; and Brigadier Murray, who commanded afterwards in the town, went out to meet a ſtrong body of the French from Montreal, who were coming to attack Quebec, in which encounter many lives were loſt on both ſides, our men then retiring within Quebec: but Admiral Lord Colville appearing in the river St. Laurence, the French retreated to Montreal with the utmoſt precipitation: and ſoon after that, General Amherſt coming up by land from the Britiſh colonies, took Montreal upon the ſurrender of the French commander, without ſtriking a blow; ſo that this country is now probably altogether in the poſſeſſion of the Engliſh. Quebec lies 300 miles N. W. of Boſton in New England. Lat. 47 deg. 35 min. N. long. 47 deg. 10 min. W.

It is governed by a mayor, recorder, twelve aldermen, &c. and ſends two members to parliament. It gave title of earl to ſeveral families, but laſt to the Hydes, deſcendants of the earl of Clarendon. Here on the Medway is a fine ſtone bridge of eleven arches. The cathedral of St. Andrew is ſtately and ancient, being of the original conſtruction before the conqueſt. Here are two churches more, but united into one pariſh. The town conſiſts of one principal broad ſtreet, but ill-built, with large ſuburbs towards the S. E. and W. The Watling-ſtreet runs directly through it from Shooter's-hill, near Blackheath, to Dover. The chalky cliff under the old caſtle being waſhed away by the rapidity of the ſtream, huge tracts of the wall have tumbled down; the ground on that ſide is low and marſhy, being overflown every tide. In ſeveral of the creeks and branches of the Medway, within the juriſdiction of Rocheſter, there is an oyſter-fiſhery, the opening and ſhutting of which grounds, with the quantity each dredgerman ſhall take in a day, is regulated by the mayor; whoſe juriſdiction in this reſpect having been conteſted, it was confirmed by an act of parliament in 1729, and by another ſince; ſo that the fiſhery flouriſhes now. It is contiguous to Chatham and Stroud; and lies 22 miles from Canterbury, and thirty from London. Its weekly markets are on Wedneſday and Friday, with annual fairs on May 30 and December 11, for horſes, bullocks, and all ſorts of commodities.

ROME, [in Latin Roma] a very ancient and conſiderable city, once the miſtreſs and conquereſs of the world, and the ſeat of the Roman empire. It has ſince been the reſidence of the pope, and head of the Roman Catholic church, and is ſituated in the Campagni di Roma, a province of the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, and middle diviſion of Italy. With it no city can compare for the magnificence of its buildings and antiquities, the number of its monuments and curiosities, together with the singularity and importance of its historical events.

Rome is the center and repository, as it were, of all that is exquisite in painting, sculpture, and architecture. According to some, it was founded 753 years before the Christian æra, and that by Romulus its first king. The form and site of this city have been frequently changed, particularly after the devastation of it by the ancient Gauls, Vandals, Heruli, East and West Goths; and lastly, by the Germans, under Charles of Bourbon, in the year 1527, when it was taken and miserably sacked; and the pope being closely besieged in the castle of St. Angelo, was obliged to submit to the conqueror. It stands at present upon twelve (anciently but seven) hills; a great part of which being washed down or mouldered into the valleys: the Tarpeian rock, once a frightful precipice, from which malefactors used to be thrown, is now no more than 20 feet high. This city is surrounded with a wall, on which are upwards of 300 antique towers, many of them decayed, and about ten Italian miles in circuit, having in it twenty gates; but not the half of this space of ground is occupied by houses, as many places where stately structures once stood, are now turned into gardens, fields, meadows, and vineyards. According to an account taken by pope Clement XI. in 1714, the number of its inhabitants was found to amount to 143,000. The Tyber runs through the city from N. to S. forming an island. That part standing on its right side is not above a fifth or sixth part of the other, and is called Trastevere, or beyond the Tyber, having a communication with the opposite side by means of five bridges, one of which is called Il Ponte Rotto, or the broken bridge, being now quite decayed. The others, which are still entire, are Ponte Sixto, De S. Bartholomeo, De Quatro Capi, and S. Angelo. In the magnificence and splendor of its religious structures, the modern Rome is at least equal to the ancient. The number of churches are reckoned about 300, the noblest and most magnificent of which is St. Peter's, for the harmony of its architecture, fineness, and great variety of carved and gilt work, pictures, Statues, &c. that cannot be viewed but with a pleasing astonishment. It stands on the site of Caligula's Circus, and was first dedicated by Constantine the Great to the twelve apostles. But in 1550, it was entirely rebuilt: for pope Julius II. began it on Bramante Lazari's plan; his successor, Paul III. continued it on that of Michael Angelo, and it was finished under the papacy of Julius V. so that it was the work of 100 years. The ornaments alone of St. Peter's chair cost 207,552 Roman crowns, at 5s. and 6d. value each. It is remarkable, that on occasion of the indulgencies granted by the popes for raising the necessary sums for this purpose, the reformation in Europe was begun by Luther. Much after the plan of this noble structure Sir Christopher Wren built the fine cathedral of St. Paul in London. It is 722 feet long, and 86 broad, the breadth of the front is 400 feet, and the whole height from the floor to the top of the cross that stands over the ball, 432 feet. Before this church is a spacious and magnificent piazza, in the middle of which is an obelisk of granate or black marble from Egypt, reared at an immense expence in the papacy of Sixtus V. by Domenico Foultana. It is eighty feet high, and stands on a pedestal of thirty more, and at top is a brass gilt cross. St. Peter's church cost 40,000,000 crowns building, besides the daily repairs and decorations made to it. The annual revenue belonging to it is upwards of 20,000l. The Pantheon, commonly called the Rotunda, though it hath lost much of its pristine magnificence, is still one of the most entire antique structures in Italy. Near St. Peter's is the Vatican or winter-palace of the pope, with a famous library of the choicest books and MSS. and a charming garden, called by way of eminence, Belvidere, having the finest collection of exotics in all Europe. Among the innumerable statues in Rome, are those of Pasquin and Marforio, to which all lampoons are usually affixed, the witty questions being put on the latter, and the answers to them on the former. The Lateran church is the pope's cathedral, and stiled the mother of all the churches in the world. It stands on Mount Cœlius. Here the pope takes possession of the papal dignity, and performs all episcopal functions. In its cloyster is the porphyry chair for scrutiny. Rome in general is magnificently built, and the streets spacious and well paved; but among these some are mean and dirty. No part in the world is better provided with fine water than Rome; for besides good springs, here are three grand aqueducts which convey water into the city. The government of Rome is divided into the spiritual and temporal. In the former the pope in his conclave regulates every thing of moment; and with regard to inferior matters, he has his vicar, who is a cardinal; and under him is a vicegerent, generally a bishop, as his assistant. The temporal rule of the city is committed to a governor, who is some cardinal or prelate, and he is obliged to give his holidesses an account every week of whatever passes. Besides his own guard, he has a barigello or captain of the Sbirri, to keep all in order and awe. Rome is divided into fourteen quarters. The citizens here are more complaisant than in any other place in Europe, and far from having that spirit of bigotry and persecution which prevails in other Roman Catholic countries. Here is plenty of all sorts of provisions, and a great variety of excellent wines; but in Rome they are drank very moderately, and generally mixed with water. It stands near 17 miles from the Tuscan sea, and about 142 N.W. of Naples, 380 S. from Vienna, 560 S. E. from Paris, and 740 from Amsterdam, 810 from London, 730 W. of Constantinople, and 900 E. of Madrid. Lat. 41 deg. 47 min. N. long. 3 deg. 5 min. E.

RO'QUELAURE, S. [Fr.] a long cloak uſed by men.

ROSAMOND, daughter of Walter lord Clifford; a young lady, according to the writers of the age ſhe lived in, of infinite beauty, whom Henry II. fell in love with and ſeduced. Among his many miſtreſſes, this lady having the chief aſcendant over him, became the principal object of the queen's jealouſy. Henry fancied he had ſecured her from all attempts, by keeping her in a bower built for that purpoſe at Woodſtock. But this bower could not ſecure the fair Roſamond from the purſuits of the jealous queen, who even here found the means of encompaſſing her end. For Henry III. who by his father's indulgence had been crowned in his life-time, rebelled in Normandy; and the queen perſuading two more of her ſons to join their brother, Henry II. was obliged to croſs the ſeas to quell the rebellious princes. During this time the queen reſided at the royal palace at Oxford, and undertook to ſee Roſamond, which ſhe effected, not by murdering the guards of the bower, and being guided into it by a clue of thread, as has been erroneouſly believed; but by a ſubterraneous way, digged from Godſtow nunnery to Woodſtock bower, though five miles diſtant from each other; and carried even under the Iſis, a navigable river. Then it was, that the enraged queen found means to diſpatch out of her way a hated rival that had cauſed her much uneaſineſs; but whether by giving her poiſon, our hiſtorians are entirely ſilent; a ſtory built probably upon no better foundation than an old ſong. The plot of Mr. Addiſon's opera upon this ſubject, has been taken for poetical fiction.

We, ſpite of fame, her fate revers'd believe,
O'erlook her crimes, and think ſhe ought to live.

He does not kill Roſamond, but ſuppoſes her to be carried away to the nunnery alive: for which he had much better authority, than for her being poiſoned and dying upon the ſpot. Certain it is, however, ſhe did not live long, at leaſt in this bower, after the queen's viſits; for either dead or alive ſhe was brought by the ſame ſubterraneous paſſage, into the nunnery; the entrance of which is ſtill to be ſeen amongſt its ruins. After all, unleſs the chronicle of John Brumpton, the monk, is of leſs authority than that of the old ſong, Roſamond did not die in 1173, nor was ſhe poiſoned by queen Eleanor. This writer ſays, that after the king had impriſoned his queen, he publicly and for a long while kept Roſamond. She was buried in the church belonging to Godſtow nunnery, and the ſame writer gives us the following epitaph, which was to be ſeen in his days; and is indeed at this time written upon the wall of the chapel choir, which is yet ſtanding, and her grave marked round with a narrow ridge of ſtones:

Hic jacet in tumbâ, Roſa Mundi non Roſa Munda,
Non redolet, ſed olet, quæ redolere ſolet.

The reader ſhall have old Speed's rendering for want of a better:

This tomb doth here incloſe,
The world's moſt beautious roſe;

Roſ

Roſe paſſing ſweet e'er while,
Now nought but odour vile.

The monument has been repaired and beautified; nor is it many years ſince there were ſome remains of the Bower to be ſeen, near Blenheim caſtle. In one of the adjacent meads they ſtill ſhew us Roſamond's pond, where ſhe is ſuppoſed to have bathed herſelf. But unleſs ſhe uſed it as a cold bath, the ſtory is ſcarcely credible: the water being extremely ſo, iſſuing directly from a rock, and falling into a ſquare baſon three or four feet deep. This lady had two ſons by the king; William, who married the daughter and heireſs of lord Saliſbury, the other Geoffrey, archbiſhop of York.

RUTLANDSHIRE, the leaſt of all the counties in England. It is almoſt of a circular form, and ſeems to have been a part of Northamptonſhire before the conqueſt, and not named as a diſtinct county till long after the Norman invaſion. It has Lincolnſhire and Northamptonſhire on the E. and S. Leiceſterſhire on the S. and W. Leiceſterſhire and Lincolnſhire on the N. It is about forty miles in circumference, containing only two market-towns, Okeham and Uppingham, and forty-eight pariſhes, but more parks than any ſhire in England for its magnitude. The air here is ſweet and ſalubrious, being quite clear from fogs and miſts; there is in this whole country but one ſtream that deſerves the name of a river, commonly called the Guaſh or Waſh, which interſects the ſhire from E. to W. quite through the middle of it, though ſeveral brooks run into it from moſt parts of the county, by which means the inhabitants are ſupplied with water as wholſome as the air, and with plenty of freſh fiſh; all the S. and E. parts in particular having good ſupplies from the river Welland, which ſeparates it from Northamptonſhire and Leiceſterſhire. The ſoil is very fruitful in corn and paſture, the latter feeding great numbers of cattle, eſpecially ſheep, the wool from which is redder than in other countries, on account of the redneſs peculiar to the ſoil. The vale of Catmos, where Okeham ſtands, is not inferior to the vales of White-horſe and Belvoir in point of fertility. It likewiſe produces abundance of wood for firing. This county is included within the dioceſe of Peterborough, and ſubject to the archdeaconry of Northampton. It gives title of duke to the Manners's family. Rutland ſends two knights of the ſhire to parliament; and in it are ſeveral fine ſeats, particularly that of the earl of Gainſborough at Exton, and the earl of Winchelſea's at Burley on the Hill, both near Okeham. The latter has noble ſtables, and a walled park five or ſix miles in circuit, with woods, rich paſture, game, &c. the houſe itſelf having been rebuilt, and elegantly furniſhed with curious paintings, a library, &c.

RY'EGRASS, S. a ſtrong and coarſe kind of graſs.

S A B

S, a conſonant, and the eighteenth letter of the alphabet. It occurs ſo often in our language, that foreigners have remarked it as a very great defect in its ſtructure. In the beginning of words it has one invariable ſound, but in the middle is ſometimes pronounced like an z, and is likewiſe pronounced ſo when it is uſed inſtead of eth, at the end of a verb. As no noun ſingular ends with a ſingle i, whenever a word ends with a ſhort vowel before s, the s is doubled, as in aſs, formerly written aſſe; and even in thoſe words which are written with diphthongs, and are naturally long, an s final is added for this reaſon, as in gooſe, houſe. The form of this letter is the ſame in the Goth. Sax. and Roman alphabets, and by inſpecting the Runic may eaſily be traced from the Greek Σ, or the w inverted thus ƨ. As an abreviature, it is ſometimes uſed for ſocius, a fellow, or ſocietas, a ſociety, as F. R. S. a fellow of the royal ſociety; and in medicinal preſcriptions for ſecundum, as S. A. ſecundum artem, i. e. according to art.

SALI'SBURY, S. or New Sarum, in contradiſtinction to Old Sarum [which ſee] the capital of Wiltſhire, and the ſee of a biſhop: it is a large, well-built, and pleaſant city, at or near which four rivers unite their ſtreams; and three of them, namely, the Nadder, Willy, and Avon, run through the ſtreets by canals. It owes its riſe to the church, the foundation of which was laid anno 1219, under biſhop Poor, by Randulph, the pope's legate, and finiſhed in 1258. According to an account delivered in to king Henry III. who, with his nobility, &c. was preſent at its conſecration, September 30, it coſt 40,000 marks, near 27,000 l. ſterling of the preſent money. This, of a Gothic ſtructure, is the moſt elegant and regular in the whole kingdom. It is built in the form of a lantern, with the ſpire in the middle, and nothing but buttreſſes and glaſs on the outſide, with not a bit of wall. The croſs aile is very beautiful and lightſome. The doors and chapels are ſaid to equal the months of the year; the windows, the days; and the pillars and pilaſters, the hours. The latter are of fuſile marble. The outſide is truly magnificent; but the inſide is not anſwerable, the painting being but indifferent; though the carving, what little there is of it, is good. The length of the whole fabric from E. to W. including the buttreſſes, &c. is 478 feet, height of the vaulting 80 feet, breadth of the W. front 889; the ſpire, which is of free ſtone, 410, being twice as high from the ground as the Monument of London. The cloyſter is of curious workmanſhip; ſome of the windows are of fine painted glaſs; and eight bells hang in a high-built ſteeple on the N. ſide of the churchyard. The chapter-houſe, which is an octagon, is 50 feet in diameter, and 150 in circuit, the roof bearing all upon one ſmall pillar in the center. The poſt of chancellor of the moſt noble order of the garter, which is annexed to the biſhop of this ſee, was firſt conferred on Dr. Richard Beauchamp, till cardinal Campegio, by oppoſing King Henry VIII's divorce, loſt it and his biſhopric: ſo that the chancellorſhip continuing 130 years afterwards in lay hands, it was reſtored to Dr. Seth Ward, in the reign of king Charles II. and to his ſucceſſors. Biſhop Jewel built a library for this cathedral, and Dr. Gheaſt furniſhed it with books. John Coldwell, M. D. dean of Rocheſter, was the firſt married biſhop of this ſee. The above-mentioned Dr. Ward contributed very largely towards making the Avon navigable from Saliſbury to Chriſt-church in Hampſhire; and a quay was built at Harnham-bridge, to which barges come up with caſe: he alſo built an hoſpital for poor widows of clergymen, among which lived lately Dr. Sacheverel's mother. Beſides the cathedral, here are three other churches, with genteel houſes, and boarding-ſchools for young gentlemen and ladies, more of the latter being educated in this city than in any other in England. The market-place, in which ſtands a fine town-houſe, is a ſpacious ſquare, and well ſupplied with all neceſſaries. Beſides the manufacture of flannels, druggets, and the cloths called Saliſbury whites, for the Turky trade, here is a conſiderable manufacture of bone-lace: ſo that it is looked upon to be as flouriſhing a city as any in the kingdom, that depends entirely on a home trade. It is governed by a mayor, &c. and it ſends two members to parliament. The number of its inhabitants is reckoned at 10,000. The cloſe, adjacent to the cathedral, in which live the canons, &c. is large, and well-built. Among the monuments in the cathedral, is a figure of one Bennet, who endeavouring to faſt forty days and forty nights, being reduced to a ſkeleton, at laſt fell a victim to his preſumptuous folly: as alſo of lord Stourton, who, for killing a gentleman and his ſon at his own table, in the reign of Philip and Mary, died at the gallows like a common malefactor; and the ſilken halter in which he was hanged, was placed over his grave, inſtead of which here is a wire, ſtill to be ſeen. This city has given the title of earl to ſeveral families, but lately to a branch of the Cecils. Here are three charity-ſchools: its weekly markets are on Tueſday and Saturday; its annual fairs are Tueſday after January 6, for cattle and woollen cloth, Monday before before March 25, for broad and narrow woollen cloth, Whitſun-Monday and Tueſday for pedlary and horſes, and Tueſday after October 10, for hops, onions, and cheeſe. It ſtands about 15 miles from Andover, 35 S. E. of Briſtol, and 83 W. of London.

SAXONY, its limits are differently deſcribed. It formerly extended over both the circles of the Upper and Lower Saxony, in Germany; but for ſome time it has been reſtricted to the electoral dominions of Saxony. In the large ſenſe, as including the Upper and Lower Saxony, it is bounded on the N. by the Baltic ſea, Denmark, and the German ocean; on the E. by Poland and Sileſia, and on the S. by Bohemia, Franconia, and Heſſe-Caſſel, and on the W. by Weſtphalia. It lies between lat. 50 and 55 deg. N. and between long. 8 and 18 deg. E. Saxony duchy, to which the electorate is annexed, is bounded on the N. by the duchies of Magdeburg and Brunſwick, the principality of Halberſtadt and electorate of Brandenburg, on the E. by Sileſia and part of Bohemia and Franconia, and on the W. by the landgravate of Heſſe. Its capital is Wittemberg; but the elector, who is alſo king of Poland, now at Warſaw, uſually reſides at Dreſden; but this latter city is now in the hands of the Auſtrian allies, as Leipſic is in thoſe of the Pruſſians; and the country in general in the preſent war has been the ſcene of a deal of bloodſhed, particularly that of Torgau, November 3, 1760, in which the king of Pruſſia beat the Auſtrians under Marſhal Count Daun. That part properly called the electorate is about 130 miles from E. to W. and 90 from N. to S. but the whole of his dominions are reckoned about 220 from E. to W. and 140 from N. to S. The elector is great marſhal of the empire, its vicar during an interregnum in all places not ſubject to the palatinate vicariate; and he appoints the meetings of all diets, except the collegial diets, &c. His country is very fruitful and populous (but in the preſent war between the elector and Pruſſia very much impoveriſhed and ſtripped of its inhabitants) being reckoned one of the wealthieſt princes of Germany, except the archduke of Auſtria. The preſent elector, like his father, renounced the Proteſtant religion, and embraced that of Rome, at twenty-one years of age, with a view to qualify him for the throne of Poland; but the other princes and their ſubjects are Lutherans, or of the Augſburg confeſſion; though among them there are ſome Calviniſts and Roman Catholics. The Saxons have capacities, ſays baron de Polnitz, equal to any nation, being naturally magnanimous and abhorrent of ſlavery; they are well made, robuſt, agile, laborious, and good ſoldiers. The German language is ſpoken in Saxony with the greateſt purity. The univerſities of this country abound with illuſtrious ſcholars; and almoſt every town is famous for politeneſs and the cultivation of the arts and ſciences, as Cranach the famous Saxon painter, and the late Handel, prince of muſicians, were born at Dreſden. The Saxons reverence Luther as much as ever, being zealous ſticklers for his doctrine.

The preſent electoral family is deſcended from Frederick the Warrior, Landgrave of Thuringia, and the Margrave of Miſnia, on whom the emperor Sigiſmund conferred that dignity preferably to John I. brother to the elector Albert II. claiming inveſtiture as neareſt of kin to Albert IV. who died without iſſue in the year 1422.

SCOTLAND, part of which is the ancient Caledonia, has ſince the union been called North Britain. It is the northern part of the main iſland, which comprehends England and Wales, and with theſe conſtituting one united kingdom ever ſince the 5th of Queen Ann in the year 1707, and that by the conſent of the parliaments of both kingdoms. By this coalition they are now in conjunction ſtyled Great Britain, and are under the ſame government of one King and parliament, with a reſerve of all the ſtatute and municipal laws of Scotland; and other privileges, &c. prior to that æra: ſo that the legiſlation, which formerly was veſted in the King and parliament of Scotland independently of thoſe of England, being removed and placed in one general parliament of Great Britain (ſixteen peers from Scotland repreſenting their nobility, and forty-five members their gentry and commonalty) the laws in common are now paſſed by the two countries in conjunction. All that part of the main iſland north of Cumberland and Northumberland, two of the moſt northerly Countries of England, belongs to Scotland; together with a great number of iſlands, particularly on the weſtern, ſouth-weſtern, and northern ſides, as the Ebude, Orcades, Shetland, &c. It has the Iriſh ſea on the W. the Deucaledonian on the N. and that part of the German ocean on the E. which in our maps is called the Britiſh or north Sea. It is about 300 miles long from N. to S. and from 50 to 150 in breadth from E. to W. being indented, and nearly cut through in many places by bays or firths of the ſea, as they are called, forming excellent harbours, at the ends and on the ſides of which are ſeveral conſiderable rivers, beſides leſſer ſtreams, abounding with fine ſalmon, trout, eels, and flounders. Scotland, excluſive of its iſlands, lies between lat. 54 deg. 30 min. and 59 deg. 30 min. N. and between long. 1 and 6 deg. W. The longeſt day is upwards of eighteen hours, and the ſhorteſt night forty-five minutes, and in ſome of the Shetland iſles leſs. The number of its inhabitants Templeman reckons at 1,500,000, which is half a million more than he computes in Ireland, though, excluſive of the iſles, he makes the latter to contain more ground. The ſoil in general does not come up to that of England in fertility; not but that ſome counties, particularly the Lothians, Fife, Buchan, Angus, Mearns, Aberdeenſhire, Roſs, Murrayland, &c. have good ſtore of grain, with which they trade to Spain, Holland, Norway, &c. The ſkirts of the country, eſpecially pecially northward, abound with timber, particularly fir-trees, &c. of a vaſt magnitude. The air is very temperate, and not half ſo cold as might be imagined in ſo northernly a climate. This, as in England is owing to the warm vapours and breezes which come continually off the ſea; and likewiſe purify the air, and puts it in ſuch a conſtant agitation, as keeps the inhabitants from any remarkable epidemic diſtempers. Great part of the country, particularly towards the N. and W. including the Grampian hills, is mountainous, hilly, and heathy; but yielding good paſture in ſeveral places: between the higher grounds are many rich valleys, and always a ſtout ſtream both in the N. and S. parts, which produce corn and cattle; but the latter, with the horſes, are moſtly of a ſmall breed. Great numbers of the cattle are driven into England, and there being ſold lean, after fattening in the Engliſh paſtures, they furniſh the London markets with delicate beef. Scotland likewiſe breeds great numbers of ſheep, many of which are ſent into England, as is the greateſt part of their wool. It has alſo a very good fiſhery of herring, cod, ling, ſalmon, &c. great quantities of which are exported, beſides great plenty of haddock, whiting, ſkait, &c. with a variety of ſhell-fiſh, as muſcels, wilks or perriwinkles, cockles, clams or ſcollops, oyſters, &c. for home-conſumption. Scotland has the better of England both for catching of herrings ſooner, and curing them better; the pickled Herrings of Glaſgow, Lochbroom, &c. being equal to thoſe of the Dutch: their ſituation for exporting them is likewiſe more commodious; ſo that they can be ſooner at market than the Dutch, the Glaſcow merchants on the coaſts of Spain, Portugal, and up the Streights; as the merchants of Dundee, Aberdeen, &c. on the Eaſtern coſt, in the Baltic, and German ocean. The Scots have manufactures of cloth, woollen ſtuffs, particularly plaids, ſome of variegated colours, others of ſcarlet, either of wool or ſilk, and finer than thoſe made in any part of Britain. Theſe are chiefly manufactured at Glaſgow, as are ſtockings, &c. at Aberdeen. Beſides ſtriped muſlins, cambrics, and thoſe tolerably fine, the main article of the Scottiſh manufacture is linnen-cloth, vaſtly encouraged and improved by virtue of premiums, &c. within theſe few years; eſpecially by the taking off the duty on it in England, and the prohibiting the wear of printed callicoes: for vaſt quantities of it are not only ſent to England, but exported to our Britiſh colonies in N. America. Scotland is ſaid to have this advantage to boaſt of, which neither England, nor hardly any nation in Europe has, namely, that in every branch of its trade with other countries, the balance is on its ſide; that is, ſhe ſends out more commodities in value than ſhe receives back; and conſequently the difference or overplus muſt be made good in ſpecie. Scotland has produced men of eminence in every branch of literature: and Chriſtianity ſeems to have been planted very early in this country; for Tertulian ſays, "That thoſe parts of Britain into which the Romans had not penetrated, became ſubject to Chriſt." The capital rivers, particularly the Forth, Clyde, Tay, and Neſs, &c. divide it into peninſulas; theſe running ſo far into the country as to be intercepted only by a ſmall iſthmus, or neck of land, but more eſpecially the ſmall diſtance of Loughneſs from the Weſtern ſea. Scotland may be divided into two Claſſes; namely, ſouth of the firth of Forth, whoſe capital, and that of the whole kingdom, is Edinburgh; and the North of the ſame Firth, the principal town in which is Aberdeen. The eſtabliſhed religion of Scotland is the Calviniſtical or Preſbyterian, as contained in the Confeſſion of Faith, authoriſed in the firſt parliament of King James VI. or which is much the ſame, the Confeſſion of divines at Weſtminſter, which the church (commonly the kirk) of Scotland have adopted. In this kingdom are ſeveral diſſenters or epiſcopalians, who originally in their extemporary prayers uſed the Lord's prayer and the Gloria; but they moſtly have adopted now the Church of England form: however, the non-jurors among them are not permitted to have meeting-houſes; and ſuffered only to preach and read the divine ſervice to a very ſmall number, ſince the year 1745; whereas ſuch miniſters as take the oaths, and pray for his Majeſty in expreſs terms, have meeting-houſes.

SHAKESPEAR, [William] was the ſon of John Shakeſpear, and was born at Stratford upon Avon in Warwickſhire, April 1564. His father, who was a conſiderable dealer in wool, being incumbered with a large family of ten children, could afford to give his eldeſt ſon but a ſlender education. He had bred him at a free-ſchool, where he acquired what Latin he was maſter of. However, our author's father was obliged to withdraw him early from ſchool, in order to have his aſſiſtance in his own employment, towards ſupporting the reſt of the family. As to want of learning, Mr. Pope makes the following juſt obſervation: that there is certainly a vaſt difference between learning and languages. How far he was ignorant of the latter, I cannot (ſays he) determine; but it is plain he had much reading, at leaſt, if they will not call it learning; nor is it any great matter if a man has knowledge, whether he has it from one language or from another. Nothing is more evident, than that he had a taſte for natural philoſophy, mechanics, ancient and modern hiſtory, poetical learning, and mythology. We find him very knowing in the cuſtoms, rites, and manners of the Romans. In Coriolanus and Julius Cæſar, not only the ſpirit, but manners of the Romans, are exactly drawn; and ſtill a nicer diſtinction is ſhewn between the manners of the Romans in the former and the latter. We have tranſlations from Ovid, publiſhed in his name, among thoſe poems which paſs for his, and for ſome of which, we have undoubted authority, being publiſhed by himſelf, and dedicated to the earl of Southampton. He appears alſo to have been converſant with Plautus, from whence he has taken the plot of one of his plays: he follows the Greek authors, and particularly Dares Phrygius in another; although I will not pretend, continues Mr. Pope, to ſay in what language he read them. Dr. Warburton has ſtrongly contended for Shakeſpear's learning, and has produced many imitations and parallel paſſages with ancient authors. Upon his quitting the grammar-ſchool, he ſeems to have entirely devoted himſelf to that way of living, which his father propoſed; and in order to ſettle in the world, after a family manner, thought fit to marry while he was yet very young. His wife was the daughter of one Hatchway, ſaid to have been a ſubſtantial yeoman in the neighbourhood of Stratford. In this kind of domeſtic obſcurity, he continued for ſome time, till, by an unhappy inſtance of miſconduct, he was obliged to quit the place of his nativity, and take ſhelter in London; which luckily proved the occaſion of diſplaying one of the greateſt geniuſes that ever was known in dramatic poetry. He had the misfortune to fall into ill company: among theſe were ſome who made a frequent practice of deer-ſtealing, and who engaged him more than once in robbing a park, that belonged to Sir Thomas Lucy, who was, it is ſaid, afterwards ridiculed by Shakeſpear, under the well known character of Juſtice Shallow. It is at this time, and upon this accident, that he is ſaid to have made his firſt acquaintance in the playhouſe. We ſhall here relate a ſtory which Sir William Davenant told Mr. Betterton, who communicated it to Mr. Rowe;

Rowe; Rowe told it Mr. Pope, and Mr. Pope, told it to Dr. Newton, the late editor of Milton, and from a gentleman, who heard it from him, it is here related. It is concerning Shakeſpeare's firſt appearance in the playhouſe. When he came to London, he was without money or friends; and being a ſtranger, he knew not to whom to apply, nor by what means to ſupport himſelf.—At that time coaches not being in uſe, and, as gentlemen were accuſtomed to ride to the playhouſe, Shakeſpear, driven to the laſt neceſſity, went to the playhouſe door, and picking up a little money by taking care of the gentlemens horſes who came to the play, he became eminent even in that profeſſion, and was taken notice of for his diligence and skill in it; he had ſoon more buſineſs than he himſelf could manage, and at laſt hired boys under him, who were known by the name of Shakeſpear's boys; ſome of the players accidentally converſing with him, found him ſo acute, and maſter of ſo fine a converſation, that ſtruck therewith, they recommended him to the houſe, in which he was firſt admitted in a very low ſtation; but he did not long remain ſo, for he ſoon diſtinguiſhed himſelf, if not as an extraordinary actor, at leaſt as a fine writer. His name is printed, as the cuſtom was in thoſe times, amongſt thoſe of the other players, before ſome old plays, but without any particular account of what ſort of parts he uſed to play: and Mr. Rowe ſays, "That though he very "carefully enquired, he found the top of his "performance was the ghoſt in his own Ham-"let." "I ſhould have been much more "pleaſed, continues Rowe, to have learned "from ſome certain authority, which was the "firſt play he writ." The higheſt date which Rowe has been able to trace, is Romeo and Juliet, 1597, when the author was 33 years old; and Richard II. and III. the next year. Though the order of time in which his ſeveral pieces are written be generally uncertain, yet there are paſſages in ſome few of them, that ſeem to fix their dates. So the chorus at the end of the fourth act of Henry V. by a compliment very handſomely turned to the earl of Eſſex, ſhews the play to have been written when that lord was general to the queen, in Ireland; and his eulogium upon queen Elizabeth, and her ſucceſſor, king James, in the latter end of his Henry VIII. is a proof of that play's being written after the acceſſion of the latter of theſe two princes to the throne of England. Queen Elizabeth had ſeveral of his plays acted before her; and that princeſs was too quick a diſcerner, and rewarder of merit, to ſuffer that of Shakeſpear to be neglected. She was ſo well pleaſed with the admirable character of Falſtaff, in the two parts of Henry IV. that ſhe commanded him to continue it in one play more, and to make him in love. This is ſaid to have been the occaſion of his writing the Merry Wives of Windſor. How well ſhe was obeyed the play itſelf is a proof. It appears by the epilogue to Henry IV. that the part of Falſtaff was written originally under the name of Oldcaſtle. Some of that family being then remaining, the queen was pleaſed to command him to alter it; upon which he made uſe of the name of Falſtaff. Shakeſpear, beſides the queen's bounty, was patroniſed by the earl of Southampton, famous in the hiſtory of that time for his friendſhip to the unfortunate earl of Eſſex. It was to that nobleman he dedicated his poem of Venus and Adonis; and it is reported, that his lordſhip gave our author 1000l. to enable him to go through with a purchaſe he heard he had a mind to make. His acquaintance with Ben Johnſon began with a remarkable piece of humanity and good nature: Mr. Johnſon, who was at that time altogether unknown to the world, had offered one of his plays to the ſtage, in order to have it acted, and the perſon into whoſe hand it was put, having turned it careleſsly over, was juſt upon returning it to him with an ill-natured anſwer, that it would be of no ſervice to their company; when Shakeſpear, luckily caſting his eye upon it, found ſomething ſo well in it, as to engage him firſt to read it through, and afterwards to recommend Mr. Johnſon and his writings to the public. The latter part of the author's life was ſpent in eaſe and retirement; he had the good fortune to gather an eſtate equal to his wants, and in that to his wiſh, and is ſaid to have ſpent ſome years before his death in his native Stratford. His pleaſant wit and good nature engaged him in the acquaintance, and entitled him to the friendſhip of the gentlemen of the neighbourhood. It is ſtill remembered in that county, that he had a particular intimacy with one Mr. Combe, an old gentleman, noted thereabouts for his wealth and uſury. It happened that in a pleaſant converſation amongſt their friends, Mr. Combe merrily told Shakeſpear, that he fancied he intended to write his epitaph, if he happened to outlive him; and ſince he could not know what might be ſaid of him when dead, he deſired it might be done immediately; upon which Shakeſpear gave him theſe lines,

'Ten in the hundred lies here engraved,
'Tis a hundred to ten his ſoul is not ſaved:
If any man aſketh who lies in this tomb?
Oh! oh! quoth the devil, 'tis my John-a-Combe.

But the ſharpneſs of the ſatire is ſaid to have ſtung the man ſo ſeverely, that he never forgave it. Shakeſpear died in the 53d year of his age, and was buried on the north ſide of the chancel, in the great church at Stratford, where a monument is placed on the wall. The following is the inſcription on his grave ſtone;

Good friend, for Jeſus ſake forbear,
To dig the duſt incloſed here.
Bleſt be the man that ſpares theſe ſtones,
And curſt be he that moves my bones.

He had three daughters, of whom two lived to be married; Judith, the elder, to Mr. Thomas Quincy, by whom ſhe had three ſons, who all died without children; and Suſannah, who was his favourite, to Dr. John Hall, a phyſician cion of good reputation in that county. She left one child, a daughter, who was married to Thomas Nash, Esq. and afterwards to Sir John Bernard, of Abington, but died likewise without iſſue. His dramatic writings were firſt publiſhed together in folio, 1623, by ſome of the actors of the different companies they had been acted in, and perhaps by other ſervants of the theatre, into whoſe hands copies might have fallen. They have been republiſhed by Mr. Rowe, Mr. Pope, Mr. Theobald, Sir Thomas Hanmer, and Doctor Warburton. Our age has had the honour of raiſing a monument in Weſtminſter-Abbey; to effect which, the tragedy of Julius Cæſar was acted at the theatre-royal in Drury Lane, April 28, 1738, and the profits ariſing from it depoſited in the hands of the earl of Burlington, Mr. Pope, Dr. Mead, and others, in order to be laid out upon the ſaid Monument. A new prologue and epilogue were ſpoken on that occaſion; the prologue was written by Benjamin Martyn, Eſq. the epilogue by the honourable James Noel, Eſq. and ſpoke by Mrs. Porter. On Shakeſpear's monument is a noble epitaph, taken from his own Tempeſt, as follows:

The cloud cap't towers, the gorgeous palaces,
The ſolemn temples, the great globe itſelf,
Yea, all which it inherit, ſhall diſſolve,
And, like the baſeleſs fabric of a viſion,
Leave not a wreck behind.

SHREWSBURY, S. the metropolis of Shropshire, or the county of Salop. It stands delightfully on the Severn, and rose out of the ruins of Uriconium, now Wroxeter, a village about four miles off. The Saxons stiled it Scrobesberg, from the hill on which it stands, having formerly been full of shrubs. It has two fair bridges on the Severn, which surrounds it, except on the N. side, in the form of a horseshoe, rendering it a peninsula by that means. Several religious foundations have anciently been here. At Shrewsbury king Richard II. held a parliament. Hither Henry, earl earl of Richmond, afterward king Henry VII. marched from Wales, where he landed, and was joined by ſir Gilbert Talbot and his nephew the earl of Shrewſbury. Here, April 15, 1551, the ſweating ſickneſs, ſays Camden, proved ſo mortal, eſpecially to the middle-aged, that hence it diſperſed itſelf throughout the kingdom. Shrewſbury gave the title of earl for many years to the Montgomerys and Talbots, and it ſtill continues in a deſcendant of the latter. Though the reſentment of parliament fell heavy on this town, for adhering to king Charles I. who came hither in the beginning of the civil wars, after his diſappointment at Nottingham, and formed an army; yet it has ſince recovered itſelf, and is now very flouriſhing. Its weekly markets for corn, cattle and proviſions, are on Wedneſday and Saturday; every Thurſday is the market for Welch cottons and flannels. The town is governed by a mayor, recorder, &c. and ſends two members to parliament. The corporation has the power of trying cauſes within itſelf, even ſuch as are capital, except for high treaſon. Here are twelve incorporated trading companies, who on Monday fortnight after Whitſuntide repair to Kingſland, on the S. ſide of the town, and oppoſite bank of the Severn, where they entertain the mayor and corporation at their reſpective bowers or arbors erected on purpoſe, and diſtinguiſhed by ſome devices ſuitable to their crafts. Roman coins are frequently dug up here, with the bones of men of a large ſize, particularly teeth three inches long, and the ſame dimenſions round; alſo thigh-bones a full yard in length. The annual fairs kept at Shrewſbury are on Saturday next after March 15, Wedneſday after Eaſter-week, and Wedneſday before Whit-Sunday. Theſe are conſiderable for horned cattle, horſes, ſheep, cheeſe, and linen-cloth: on July 3 and Auguſt 12, for horned cattle, horſes, pigs, cheeſe, linen, ſheep, and lambs wool; October 2 and December 12, for horned cattle, horſes, ſheep, pigs, butter, cheeſe, and linen. In the neighbourhood was fought the bloody battle between young Henry Piercy, ſurnamed Hotſpur, and Henry IV. king of England; in which the former was killed, and his army overthrown, the place being to this day called Battlefield. It ſtands 157 miles N. W. of London. Lat. 52 deg. 47 min. N. long. 2 deg. 4 min. W.

SHROPSHIRE, or the county of Salop, in England. It is bounded on the E. by Staffordſhire; on the N. by Cheſhire; on the S. by Worceſterſhire, Herefordſhire, and Radnorſhire; and on the W. by the ſhires of Montgomery and Denbigh, in North Wales. The river Severn riſing in Plinlimon hills, in Montgomeryſhire, runs through the county from W. to S. E. dividing it into two parts. This is a large inland county, being, according to Templeman, forty miles in length, and thirty three in breadth; others reckon it thirty-four miles from Woſerton below Ludlow on the S. to Over near Trent on the N. and twenty-five from Tong on the S. to Oſweſtry on the W. It is of an oval or nearly circular form, containing about 890,000 acres, with about 139,000 inhabitants, 15 market towns, and 170 pariſhes; which are all diſtributed into fifteen hundreds, in the dioceſs of Hereford, Litchfield and Coventry, and St. Aſaph. The air of this country is very ſalubrious, as is generally the caſe in ſuch as are mountanous or hilly. The ſoil, which in many parts, is of a reddiſh clay, is of various fertility; the S. and S. W. parts, which are moſtly hilly, not being altogether ſo fruitful as the low grounds, of which this county has its ſhare. Here plenty of wheat and barley is produced, together with other ſorts of grain, beſides inexhauſtible pits of coal. This country, as being formerly a frontier between the the Welch and Engliſh, has had more caſtles than any other in England, ſo that it ſeems to be parted by a continued wall of caſtles: and Speed reckons no leſs than thirty-two, beſides the fortified towns, that were once in this ſhire. The county of Salop lies in the Oxford circuit, and it ſends twelve members to parliament; namely, two Knights of the ſhire, with two burgeſſes each for Shrewſbury, Brudges or Bridgenorth, Ludlow, Wenlock, and Biſhop's-caſtle. Its capital is Shrewſbury.

SOMERSETSHIRE, one of the counties of England, ſo called from Somerton, formerly its principal town. It is bounded by Devonſhire on the W. Dorſetſhire on the S. the Briſtol channel or Severn ſea on the N. a ſmall part of Glouceſterſhire on the N. E. and Wiltſhire on the E. This is a very rich and large county, being about ſixty miles long from Oure in the W. to Froome in the E. and about fifty where broadeſt, from Crewkerne in the S. to Porſhut in the N. In it are 3 cities, 42 hundreds, 132 vicarages, 385 pariſhes, near 1700 villages, and 30 market-towns. It ſends eighteen members to parliament, two for the county, and two for each of the following places, viz Briſtol, Bath, Wells, Taunton, Bridgewater, Ilcheſter, Milbourne port, and Minehead. It contains about 280,000 ſouls. The air is the mildeſt, and the ſoil for the moſt part is the richeſt in all England, the produce of an acre being ſometimes from forty and fifty to ſixty buſhels of grain. It is deep and dirty travelling through this county in winter, the moſt marſhy parts lying between Bridgewater and Axbridge; but in ſummer there is not that length of ground in the kingdom which is ſmoother and more pleaſant. The weſtern and eaſtern parts are hilly and ſtony; and though ſome roads are ſplaſhy, the bottom is firm. As its ſoil varies, ſo does its produce. It abounds with grain of all kinds, ſupplying home and foreign markets with vaſt quantities. The hills yield mines of coal, lead, and copper. Wood thrives here extremely; and teazles, a ſort of thiſtles, which the cloth-dreſſers uſe, hardly grow in any place elſe. Ocre is dug on and about the Mendip hills; and of lapis calaminaris, calaminaris, (without which and Copper no braſs can be made) there is more dug up in this county than in all the kingdom beſides. From the richneſs of the paſtures here are produced vaſt quantities of cheeſe, of which the beſt and biggeſt are made at Chedder, not inferior to parmeſan. Its oxen are of equal magnitude with thoſe of Lancaſhire and Lincolnſhire, and ſaid to be of a finer texture; its valleys feed and fatten great numbers of ſheep, and thoſe of the largeſt ſize. The maſtiffs of this county are the boldeſt of all others of the kind at bull-baiting. Here are manufactured all ſorts of cloth, as broad and narrow kerſeys, druggets, ſerges, duroys, and ſhalloons; together with ſtockings and buttons. In the S. E. parts are alſo made great quantities of linen. The largeſt hills in Somerſetſhire are Mendip, Pouldon, and Quantock; the firſt abounding with lead and coal, the ſecond with cornfields, and the third with whurts or whirtleberries; of which the middling and ordinary people make pies, or eat them only with milk, &c. They are as large as currans, being black when ripe, and of a pungent taſte. Theſe hills, eſpecially Mendip, take different denominations, according to the pariſhes they confine on. The people of Somerſet are plain, downright, and free-hearted; but, as one of their own natives obſerves, who thinks he knows their temper, "They are chargeable, in general, with a little too much poſitiveneſs, bluntneſs, or reſerve in converſation; too great a contempt of letters, and too much indifference for the reſt of the world, poſſibly from their having too high an opinion of their own portion in it; yet undoubtedly this ſhire has produced great men in arms and arts, church and ſtate: we have had our Courcies, Gournays, and Blakes, in war; our Harringtons and Lockes in ſcience; our Hoopers and Hales in the church; our Powlets, Portmans, Pophams, in the ſtate; with many others of great note in that claſs." This county, which is in the dioceſe of Bath and Wells, formerly gave title of Earl, and afterwards of Duke, to the Seymours, deſcended from Edward Duke of Somerſet the protector, and uncle to king Edward VI.

SOU'THAMPTON, anciently Hamtun, from Triſanton, i. e. in Britiſh the bay of Anton, whence by contraction Hanton, and the county Hantſhire; a borough and port of Hampſhire, alſo a county of itſelf. It ſtands between two large rivers, the Alre or Itching on the E. and the Teſe or Anton on the W. which falls here into that called the Southampton-water, an arm of the ſea running up to it for ſome miles, and very deep, ſo that ſhips of 500 tons have been built in it. The river Itching comes from Wincheſter: and the Teſe, which runs into the Southampton-water at Redbridge, comes from Stockbridge and the edge of the New-foreſt. They are both navigable for ſome way up the country, and particularly ſerve for bringing down timber, vaſt quantities of which lie here upon the ſhore, and are fetched from thence by the ſhip-builders at Portſmouth-dock. Southampton is a mayor-town, and ſends two members to parliament. Here is ſaid to be one of the broadeſt ſtreets in England, three quarters of a mile long, well paved, and flagged on each ſide, terminating in a very fine quay. Formerly all the Canary brought into the kingdom was obliged to be landed firſt here, till the London merchants finding this an inconvenience, purchaſed that privilege of the corporation; and had afterwards their wines directly brought to London. Some merchants here carry on the Port and French wine trade; but their greateſt dealings are with Jerſey and Guernſey; and not a little, as their enemies ſay, of the ſmuggling trade: others indeed among them trade to Newfoundland for fiſh, which they carry up the Streights, &c. The aſſizes are uſually kept here in the town-hall, and in ſummer a coach runs every day betwixt this and London. Here are five churches for the natives, though fewer would ſuffice, and one for the French Refugees; alſo in this town is an hoſpital called God's houſe. Beſides a free-ſchool founded by King Edward VI. here is a charity-ſchool by ſubſcription, for thirty boys, who are cloathed and taught reading, writing, arithmetic, &c. Southampton gives title of Duke and Earl to the Fitzroys, the deſcendants from K. Charles II. by the dutcheſs of Cleveland. It lies ten miles from Goſport, twelve from Wincheſter, and ſeventy-eight from London. Its weekly markets are Tueſday, Thurſday, and Saturday; and annual fairs on April 25, and Trinity-Monday, for horſes, cattle, and leather. At the S. E. corner, near the quay, is a fort, called the Tower, with ſome guns on it. Not far off King Canute, ſeating himſelf on the banks of the Itching at low water, with all his royal apparatus on, very ridiculouſly commanded the tide not to approach his footſtool; but it obliged him to retreat, to the great mortification of his ſycophants and himſelf; who never after, it is ſaid, would ſuffer the crown to be ſet on his head.

SOU'THWARK, commonly pronounced Southrick, as being a work or building to the S. of London and London-bridge. It is denominated nated the Borough, or Boroughwick, and ſtands in the county of Surry; and tho' it ſeems to be only a ſuburb of the grand capital, yet for extent, number of inhabitants, trade, wealth, hoſpitals, &c. is inferior to few cities in the kingdom, except London and Weſtminſter. It contains the pariſhes of St. Olave, St. John at Horſleydown, St. Saviour, vulgarly St. Mary Over or Overy, St. George, St. Thomas, and Chriſtchurch: theſe, together with the adjacent pariſhes of St. Mary's at Lambeth, St. Mary Magdalen's Bermondſey, St. Mary's Newington, and St. Mary's Rotherhithe, or vulgarly Rederiff, compoſe that part of the diſtrict within the bills of mortality which lies in the hundreds of Kingſton and Brixton. That which was before computed to be nine miles along the Thames from Vauxhall to Deptford-bridge, has been found, by the exacteſt menſuration, to be ſix miles twenty-three poles and two feet in length, from Vauxhall-bridge to the eaſt end of Holding-ſtreet beyond Rotherhithe-wall, and about nine in the centre, namely, where broadeſt, from London-bridge to the ſtone's-end at Newington-butts. Hiſtory mentions Southwark as early as 1053, when it was governed, as a diſtinct corporation, by its own bailiff till 1327, when the firſt grant was made of it to the city of London, whoſe mayor was to be its bailiff, and to govern it by his deputy. Some time after, the inhabitants recovered their privileges; but in the reign of Edward VI. the crown granted it again to the city of London for 647l. 2s. 1d. and in conſideration of 500 marks more paid by that city, it was annexed thereto; with certain privileges enjoyed there by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Abbot of Bermondſey, &c. ever ſince which period, it has been ſubject to the lord mayor of London, who has under him a ſteward and bailiff, and is governed by one of its twenty-ſix aldermen, under the name of Bridge-ward without. On the W. ſide of the Borough was a palace built by the duke of Suffolk, in the reign of King Henry VIII. called Suffolk-houſe, afterwards Southwark place, and laſtly, the Mint, from a coinage here formerly. It conſiſts of ſeveral ſtreets, whoſe inhabitants aſſumed a protection from arreſts for debt, which occaſioning many frauds and abuſes, it was ſuppreſſed by an act in the reign of king William. St. Saviour's is the principal church in Southwark, and belonged formerly to a priory or abbey here of canons regular, the remains of the cells being ſtill viſible in the cloſe, and which, from its dedication to the virgin Mary, and its ſituation over the Ree, or the river Thames, oppoſite to London, (where ſome ſay there was a ferry, before the building of London-bridge) occaſioned its being called St. Mary Over-Ree, which it ſtill retains among the common people, though changed by act of parliament, in king Henry VIII.'s reign, to that of St. Saviour, and united to the pariſhes of St. Margaret and St. Mary Magdalen. This church is an ancient and ſpacious Gothic ſtructure, built in the form of a cathedral, with three aiſles from E. to W. and a croſs aiſle; alſo four handſome ſpires, and a tower with a clock, and a melodious ring of bells. Among its monuments are particularly thoſe of John Gower the famous poet, and Dr. Lockier the famous pill-quack, &c. In this pariſh are particularly remarkable the ſeſſions houſe on St. Margaret's hill, where formerly ſtood the church of St. Margaret, united as above-mentioned. On the S. ſide, in a nich adorned with Corinthian pillars, ſtands a ſtatue of King James II. in his robes, &c. Alſo the Talbot inn, where on the main beam is an inſcription, that Sir Geoffrey Chaucer, the father of Engliſh poetry, and twenty-nine pilgrims, lay here, anno 1383, in their way to Canterbury. The borough is particularly diſtinguiſhed for the buſtle all along the Thames ſide at its warehouſes, wharfs, and landing-places; as alſo for the dying buſineſs, and for its capital ſtreet being the great thoroughfare to and from London. In its inland parts are conſiderable tan-yards, perhaps the greateſt in England; pottery and whitening yards, pin-makers, &c. It ſends two members to parliament; and as it is a place of conſiderable extent, we have ſeen on this occaſion great caballing and frequent meetings at taverns, in canvaſſing for candidates on that ſcore.

SOU'TH-WEST, S. the point between the S. and W.

SOW, S. [ſcuga, Brit. ſugu, Sax. ſwina, Port. ſus, Lat. ὑς, Gr.] a female pig or hog. An oblong maſs, applied to lead.

To SOW, V. A. [part. paſſ. ſown: ſaian, Goth. ſaa, Iſl. ſæwan, Sax.] to ſcatter ſeed on the ground for growth. Figuratively, to ſpread or propagate. To beſprinkle. See SEW.

To SOWCE, V. A. ſee SOUSE.

To SOWL, V. A. to pull by the ears.

SOWN, participle of Sow.

SPACE, S. [eſpace, Fr. ſpatium, Lat.] the diſtance between any two bodies or points. Quantity, applied to time.

SPA'CIOUS, Adj. [ſpacieux, Fr. ſpatioſus, Lat.] wide; containing a great deal of room or ſpace.

SPADE, S. [Iſl. ſpada, Sax.] a broad ſhovel uſed in digging. A deer three years old. In cards, wherein the 4 ſuits repreſent 4 ſtates in a kingdom, the nobility were repreſented by the ends of lances or ſpikes. The Spaniards however repreſent them by the eſpadas, i. e. ſwords inſtead of ſpikes, and our ignorance of the deſign of the inventor, as well as of the Spaniſh language, has occaſioned our repreſenting the points of this ſuit broader, and calling them by the name of ſpades.

SPADI'LLE, S. [Fr.] at ombre and quadrille, the ace of ſpades.

SPAGY'RIC, S. [coined by Paracelſus, from ſpaber, Teut. a ſearcher] a chymiſt.

SPAIN, the ancient Iberia, Celtiberia, and Heſperia Major, now Hiſpania. The Spaniards themſelves call it Eſpanna, the French Eſpagne, and we by contraction Spain. This is the moſt weſtern part of all the continent of Europe,

Europe, being encompaſſed on every ſide by the ſea, except on the ſide of France, from which it is ſeparated by a continued and huge ridge of mountains called the Pyrenees. On the E. and S. it is bounded by the Mediterranean, the Streights of Gibraltar, the ancient Fretum Gaditanum, and by part of the Atlantic ocean; on the W. by the ſame ocean; and on the N. by that part of it called the Bay of Biſcay, or ſimply the Bay, as alſo by the Pyrenean mountains. It lies between lat. 36 and 44 deg. N. extending itſelf in length from long. 10 deg. W. to 3 deg. E. that is, 13 deg. from E. to W. and 8 deg. from N. to S. The whole circuit of Spain, in a continued direction from town to town, and from port to port, excluſive of creeks and bays, amounts to about 600 leagues, reckoning three miles to each league, which make 1800 miles, Portugal, anciently a part of Spain, being included in this calculus. Spain is ſituated about the middle of the temperate zone; upon which account, as well as for its manifold ranges of high and pleaſant hills, beautiful plains, and variety of rivers and leſſer ſtreams, it is not only a very delightful, but a moſt healthy climate; being on the one hand free from the ſcorching heats to which Africa is expoſed; and on the other, from the froſt, rain, and other inclemencies of the more northern regions. The ſultry heats in ſummer laſt only about two, or at moſt three, months; and theſe are generally tempered by cooling breezes: beſides, this exceſſive heat is only about four or five hours at moſt in a day, during the above-mentioned ſpace, while the remaining part of the year is delightful and temperate. To this may be added, that the ſky is moſtly ſerene and clear. The great rains in this country fall regularly in their ſeaſons of ſpring and autumn. It muſt however be owned, that the degrees of heat and cold differ very much between the northern and ſouthern parts of Spain, not only on account of the difference of their latitude, but alſo from other circumſtances. The ſoil of this country is in general fruitful; and though it differs much in one place from another, and the more northerly places be the barrenneſt; yet its moſt mountainous and rocky parts produce ſomething for uſe: ſome are covered with ſtately trees of various kinds, either for timber or fuel. The rocky parts abound with wild thyme, marjoram, and other aromatics, which ſerve to feed vaſt numbers of ſheep, goats, &c. giving their milk and fleſh an exquiſite reliſh; and if theſe are ſcorched with too much heat in ſummer, the cattle are driven down to the ſides of the hills, where they find plenty of thoſe herbs, and in many of them a great deal of graſs, which, though ſhort, is yet ſweet and nouriſhing. If theſe alſo fail, as is often the caſe, through exceſſive drought, they have ſtill their meadow-grounds well watered with rivers and leſſer ſtreams. Other mountainous and rocky lands yield great quantities of the plant eſparto, of which ropes and other cordage are made. The Spaniſh wheat is inferior to none, if not the very beſt in Europe, as appears from their excellent bread, and the common produce is more than the natives can conſume. Barley is here very good, and in ſuch plenty, that it is the common grain for their horſes and mules, inſtead of oats, which are here very ſcarce, and the ſtraw of it ſerves them inſtead of hay. Wines they have here likewiſe in ſuch abundance, that the pooreſt ſort drink them; and the various ſorts are Malaga, Sherry, Galicia, Alicant, Barcelona, and a much greater number of others, which ſeldom or ever come among us, though nothing inferior to thoſe already mentioned, their exportation by land-carriage from the higher or more inland parts being expenſive; otherwiſe they could ſpare much greater quantities to foreign lands, as the Spaniards are naturally very ſober, ſeldom drinking it without water, and the women never, except in lying-in, and ſuch other extraordinary caſes. With regard to fruits, they have not only thoſe which are cultivated with ſo much pains in England, and in much greater perfection; but likewiſe many others, which with all our art cannot be brought to any tolerable ripeneſs, and with which we are ſupplied from them, as citrons, lemons, oranges, almonds, raiſins, prunes, olives, dates, figs, cheſnuts, pomegranates, capers, &c. Their oil, wax, and honey, are allowed to be as good as any in the world. Few countries exceed this for plenty, goodneſs, and variety of fowl, wild and tame, four-footed game, as deer, red and fallow, hares, rabbits, and wild boars in particular: and as to tame ſwine, the Spaniſh bacon is found to exceed even that of Weſtphalia. Their ſheep, beſides the fine taſte of their fleſh, are ſtill of greater value on account of their incomparable wool, exceeding, as our clothworkers know, any in Europe. With regard to the ſilken manufacture, above 1,000,000 of people are ſaid to be employed in feeding ſilkworms, as alſo in ſpinning or weaving ſattin, damaſk, tabby, velvets, ſhaggs, &c. The ſame may be ſaid of their cotton, hemp, and flax, which grow here in large quantities, and employ a proportionable number of hands; not to dwell on their ſcarlet die, ſaffron, ſugar, pitch, roſin, &c. If we dive into the bowels of the earth, beſides gold, ſilver, quickſilver, of which latter they ſend large quantities to the Weſt-Indies for ſmelting and ſeparating the ſilver from the ore, their lead, copper, and excellent iron, the beſt of which is dug from the mountains of Biſcay, and ſent all over Europe; they have great plenty of ſulphur, alum, calamine, &c. alſo jet, agat, cornelian, granate, chryſtal, marble, alabaſter, jaſper, and other ſtones. With regard to their gold and ſilver mines, the quantities extracted from which were prodigious, they have quite neglected them ever ſince they have been able to draw ſuch immenſe quantities of thoſe metals from America. The Spaniards, like moſt other nations, fond of their antiquity, deduce their original from Tubal (Jubal), Noah's grandſon. The conqueſt of the country was not perfected by the

the Romans till the reign of Auguſtus, who ſubdued the Cantabrians or Biſcayners, and parts adjacent; after which the reſt of the inhabitants were eaſily deterred into a ſubjection to the Roman yoke. The preſent diviſion of Spain is into fourteen kingdoms or provinces, beſides the iſlands, and excluſive of Portugal, which is ſubject to a ſovereign of its own. The moſt conſiderable rivers of Spain are, 1. The Iberus, now Ebro. 2. The Durius, now Duero or Douro. 3. The Tagus, now Tajo. 4. The Anas, now Guadiana; alſo a conſiderable river in Portugal. 5. The Bœtis, now Guadalquiver. Beſides theſe might be mentioned near 150 more, and thoſe no ſmall ſtreams; alſo lakes and ſprings that are innumerable. The crown of Spain is hereditary and abſolute, and has been ſo ever ſince the Saracens or Moors over-ran this country in the year 714, upon the invitation of count Julian, out of revenge to king Roderigo for debauching his daughter; this was the laſt of the Gothic race of kings from Attaulphus, the brother of the famous Alaric. Prince Pelagius or Pelajo was the firſt who oppoſed the Mooriſh tyranny in Aſturias and Biſcay, which was at length, after much to do, extirpated out of Spain, in the reign of Ferdinand and Iſabella, king and queen of Aragon, Caſtile, and Leon; by whoſe daughter Johanna, mother of Charles, afterwards Charles V. emperor of Germany, the crown deſcended to him and his poſterity. Upon failure of male heirs the crown comes to the next female; and it would ſeem that the reigning ſovereign, if he has no iſſue of his own, has a power of deviſing it to the next royal branch, as was the caſe with the late Philip V. who held his title from the latter will of his predeceſſor Charles II. of Auſtria: and, though his grandfather, Lewis XIV. of France, had, upon his marriage with the Infanta of Spain, ſolemnly renounced all claim to the Spaniſh dominions, yet that ſettlement was confirmed by the treaty of Utrecht; and now it is in the ſecond ſon Charles III. of the ſecond venter of the houſe of Medicis, who was lately king of the Two Sicilies. The heir to the crown is always ſtiled prince of Aſturias. The king of Spain is never crowned; but the cortes or ſtates meet and recognize his title at his acceſſion. Theſe high courts are in ſome meaſure the ſame as a parliament, conſiſting of the nobility, clergy, and repreſentatives of the people; but have loſt their former privileges, and now only meet to confirm or record the decrees of the Spaniſh ſovereign, who will oblige their compliance, ſhould they prove refractory. The dominions of Spain are the largeſt, and perhaps the richeſt, of any in the world, if we include the two vaſt empires of Mexico and Peru, &c. in America, now ſubject to it. For theſe are reckoned to extend about 6000 miles in length from N. to S. beſides all the iſlands and other vaſt territories in that part of the world. The principal coins of Spain are of gold, as piſtoles or doubloons, of about ſeventeen ſhillings value. Their ſilver coin are reals, reckoned worth ſomething more than ſixpence; alſo pieces of eight, or eight reals, being about four ſhillings and ſixpence, beſides braſs coins of ſeveral inferior denominations, and maravedies, which is a coin merely of account, &c. The grandees of Spain are the prime nobility, this being a title conferred upon them by the king. Their privilege is to be covered before his majeſty. They are diſtinguiſhed into the higher and lower claſs, and they take place of all the reſt of the nobility. Their genius for learning is hardly inferior to any, as is plain from the great number of learned men and literary works produced in all ages; but for theſe few centuries paſt they have been addicted too much to metaphyſics, beſides their extreme bigotry, and the obſtacles put to their more laudable reſearches. With regard to wit and humour in their dramatic and romantic performances, they exceed all other nations; an irrefragable inſtance of the latter is the immortal Don Quixote of Cervantes. The ſame might be ſaid of them with relation to politics, were their genius that way not cramped by living under ſo deſpotic a government. Loyalty and fidelity to their princes they in general have been ever juſtly famed for, hiſtory affording inſtances of whole armies who choſe to ſtarve in their camp rather than deſert. In ſhort, they have been always, till of late, repreſented as a people zealous in religion, conſtant in friendſhip, modeſt in behaviour, undaunted in danger, patient in hardſhips, charitable, generous, and free-hearted; but their conduct in ſome inſtances, eſpecially with regard to the Britiſh nation in the late war, may be looked upon as diametrically oppoſite to a part of this character, the cauſe of which change it is not the buſineſs of this place to aſſign. On the other hand, they are univerſally too much given to women, too jealous and reſenting where that ſex is concerned. They affect a haughty air among ſtrangers; though, where they are acquainted, none are more courteous, this being rather aſſumed, and chiefly proceeding from an ambitious humour of appearing in a better light. Their jealouſy ſeldom fails to end in bloodſhed; and though duelling has been aboliſhed by many ſalutary laws, they ſeem, in Spain, Portugal, and Italy, only to have exchanged it for a worſe, namely, private aſſaſſination, which is not a little encouraged by the aſylum which churches and monaſteries afford theſe aſſaſſins. The preſent Spaniſh exceeds all other languages in Europe for grandeur and majeſty, copiouſneſs, cadence, and elegancy; the Roman wits obſerving, that the Celts ſpoke their figurative language as if they went upon ſtilts. The religion univerſally profeſſed in Spain is that of the Romiſh church in its utmoſt bigotry and ſuperſtition, beyond any other people of that communion; for the inquiſition here is more ſevere than in the Pope's dominions. The Spaniards pretend that Chriſtianity was planted among them by the Apoſtle St. James or St. Jago, who is the tutelary patron of this kingdom: here however it is plain there were converts in St.

St. Paul's time, as that apoſtle mentions, in the epiſtle to the Romans, his intention of paſſing into Spain.

STA'FFORD, S. a mayor-borough, and the aſſize-town of Staffordſhire, lies low, on the river Sow, over which is a good bridge. Here are two handſome churches, a free-ſchool, and ſpacious market-place, in which ſtands the ſhire-hall. The town is well built, and paved, and much increaſed in its wealth and inhabitants, by means of its manufacture in cloth. Here the cuſtom of borough Engliſh is ſtill kept up. It gives title of earl to the catholic branch of the Howards. Its weekly market is on Saturday, and annual fairs on the Tueſday preceding Shrovetide, and on May 14 for horſes and cattle; June 29 for wool; October 2 for colts; and December 4 for cattle and ſwine. It lies about twelve miles from Litchfield, and 155 weſt from London.

STA'FFORDSHIRE, S. one of the counties of England, is bounded on the E. by Warwickſhire and Derbyſhire; on the S. by Worceſterſhire; and on the W. by Shropſhire and Cheſhire; which laſt joining Derbyſhire on the N. where it terminates in an obtuſe angle, forms its northern confines. The river Trent divides the county into the N. E. and S. W. parts; the former of theſe again ſubdivided into the moorlands, being the more northerly mountainous parts that lie between the Trent and the Dove, from the three ſhireheads to Draycot in the Moors, and into the Woodlands, which is the more ſoutherly part of the county from Draycot to Winchmore, &c. Staffordſhire lies from S. to N. almoſt in form of a rhombus, being commonly reckoned forty miles long, and twenty-ſix broad; though Templeman gives ſeven miles more to the length, and ſix more to the breadth. It contains one city, eighteen market-towns, five hundreds, and 150 pariſhes. Though this county is boggy here and there, its air is generally good: in moſt parts it is hilly, where the air is excellent, particularly between Beach and Trentham, a tract clear from woods, mines, or bogs; ſo that the people here affirm that they have three chriſtenings to one burying. This county is watered by theſe three principal rivers; namely, the Trent, the third river in England, interſecting the county to Derbyſhire, having the volume of its waters increaſed on the N. ſide by ſeveral rivulets, with the Sow, Eccleſhal-water, and other ſtreams. 2. The Dove, which running through a limeſtone ſoil, and overflowing the meadows, renders them very fruitful; though Dr. Plot aſcribes this fertility to the ſheeps dung waſhed down from the hills. And, 3. by the Tame; not that which joins the Iſis, but the river of the ſame name, which runs by Tamworth, and afterwards falls into the Trent, &c. Here are alſo medicinal waters; ſome mixed with bitumen, others with ſalts, and ſome again with ſulphur. Of the bituminous ſort are the ſprings near Beesford-houſe, called Warm-well, with another at Hyntſ. Of the ſaline kind, and of a ſtronger brine, are the brine-pits at Chertley, from which go white ſalt is made; others are of a weaker brine, as thoſe about Epſon, Penſuit-cloſe, and a lough from a coal mine in Blue-hill and pariſh of Leeke, which tinges with the colour of ruſt. Of the ſulphurous ſort are St. Eraſmus's well at Ingeſtre, another near Codſal-wood, one at Willoughbridge-park, which contains a moſt rectified ſulphur. In this park are ſaid to be no leſs than ſixty of thoſe ſprings. There are other waters not reducible to any of the former claſſes, as Salter's-well, near Newcaſtle Under Line, Elder-well, near Blim-hill, and the Spa, near Wolverhampton. The moorlands, which are mountainous, and therefore reckoned the moſt barren, produce a ſhort but ſweet graſs; and feed as large cattle as thoſe of Lancaſhire. The banks of the Dove in particular maintain the great dairies which ſupply Uttoxeter market with ſuch ſtore of butter and cheeſe. Great numbers of ſheep, generally with black noſes, are fed in the northern as well as in the ſouthern parts; but they are ſmall, and their wool coarſe. Of this much is manufactured in the cloathing and felting buſineſs; nor is the arable ground leſs fruitful than the paſtures; and even the moorlands, when manured with marl and lime, mixed with turf-aſhes, produce good oats and barley. The ſouthern parts, and ſome adjacent pariſhes in the north, yield wheat, rye, barley, pulſe, &c. In theſe parts they alſo ſow flax and hemp. With regard to ſubterraneous productions, the moors and woodlands yield lead, copper, iron, marble, alabaſter, mill-ſtones, coal, ſalt, &c. Of this ſort is the chace of Cannock-wood, and moſt of the warrens and parks in this county. In the more fruitful parts are ſeveral marls, which are uſed with great ſucceſs on the lands, and bricks made of reddiſh clay marl. Here likewiſe is brick-earth which burns blue, fuller's-earth, potters-clay, particularly a ſort uſed in the glaſſes at Amblecot, the beſt in England, and therefore ſold at ſevenpence a buſhel, and ſent as far as London, Briſtol, &c. Slip, a reddiſh earth, with which divers veſſels are painted; yellow and red ochres, chiefly in the beſt lands, and tobacco-pipe clay. It likewiſe yields valuable ſtones and various minerals, as fire-ſtone, rocks of lime-ſtone, iron-ſtone, of which is a ſort called muſh, as big as the crown of a hat, and containing about a pint of a cold ſharp liquor, yet pleaſant, which the workmen are fond of; the beſt ſort of iron wares are made of it. Alſo blood-ſtones, or hæmatites, copper ore, lead ore, quarry ſtones, mill and grind ſtones; and laſtly, alabaſter and marble, of which there are whole mountains. In this county there is plenty of turf and peat, cannel-coal, peacock-coal, and pit-coal. It is governed by the four archdeacons of Stafford, Derby, Coventry, and Shrewſbury, and contains about 600 pariſhes. It ſends to parliament two knights of the ſhire, two members for Litchfield, and the like number each for Stafford and Newcaſtle Under Line. The people of this county are particularly noted for being ſwift-footed, foot-races being their favourite diverſion.

SU'RREY, S. one of the counties of England. It is contiguous on the W. to Berkſhire and Hampſhire; on the S. to Suſſex; on the E. it joins Kent; and the river Thames parts it from Middleſex on the N. It is about thirty-four miles long and twenty-one in breadth, containing thirteen hundreds, 140 pariſhes, ten of which are in Southwark and the parts adjacent; alſo eleven market-towns, thirty-five vicarages, 450 villages and hamlets, with 171,000 inhabitants. This is a healthy county, having in it ſeveral royal palaces, with numberleſs ſeats of nobility, gentry and merchants, more eſpecially in the parts W. of London, and along the Thames that way; yet the air, as well as the ſoil of the middle and extreme parts, differs greatly; for the climate of the latter is mild, being very fruitful in corn and hay, with a fine intermixture of woods, fields, and meadows, eſpecially on the S. part about Holmſdale, and on the N. Towards the Thames; but the air is bleak in the heart of the county, which, a delightful ſpot here and there excepted, is open ſandy ground, or barren heath: for which reaſon this county has not been improperly compared to coarſe cloth, with a fine liſt or border. In ſome places are long ridges of hills or downs; with warrens for rabbits, ſhelter for hares, and parks for deer. Its principal rivers, beſides the noble Thames on its N. ſkirts, are the Mole, the Wey, and the Wandle, which abound in fiſh; the laſt of theſe excels particularly in fine trout. The chief produce of this county, beſides corn, are box-wood, walnuts, and fullers-earth; which laſt article, ſo ſerviceable in the cloathing cloathing trade, is ſold at a groat a buſhel from the pits near Rygate. It gave formerly title to the earl, who in the abſence of king Henry VIII. at the ſiege of Tournay, fought the bloody battle of Floddenfield in Northumberland, againſt the Scots under James IV. in which that king fell, fighting valiantly at the head of his nobles, and thereupon his men were routed, and at preſent to the duke of Norfolk; and ſents to parliament, beſides two knights of the ſhire, two members for each of the boroughs of Southwark, Blechingly, Ryegate, Guildford, Gatton, and Haſlemere.

SU'SSEX, S. a county of England, during the heptarchy called the country of the South Saxons. It is bounded on the W. by Hampſhire; on the S. by the Britiſh channel; on the N. by Surrey; and on the E. by Kent. Its extent along the channel is ſixty-five miles, and twenty-nine in breadth. It is divided into ſix rapes, with a caſtle, river, and foreſt to each; and it is further ſubdivided into ſixty-five hundreds, in which are reckoned 312 pariſhes, 123 vicarages, one city, eighteen market-towns, 1060 villages, hamlets, and chapelries, with about 129,000 inhabitants. Its principal rivers are the Arun, the Adur, the Ouſe, and the Rother; but none of theſe will admit a veſſel of 500 tons, by reaſon of the ſand and beach thrown up by the ſea into their mouths. Beſides theſe, there are likewiſe the Lavant, the Cuckmeer, the Aſhburn, and Aſten, which have all, as well as the former rivers, their ſource and exit in this county. The air along the coaſt is aguiſh; but is ſweet and healthy on the downs. The ſoil differs; for the hilly parts are leſs fruitful, and the valleys deep and dirty, but fertile withal; eſpecially the Weald, which produces plenty of oats and hops. The air here, though foggy, and not reckoned unwholeſome by the natives, cannot, one would think, be ſaid to be proper to breathe in. The roads in this part are the worſt in England. SU'RREY, S. one of the counties of England. It is contiguous on the W. to Berkſhire and Hampſhire; on the S. to Suſſex; on the E. it joins Kent; and the river Thames parts it from Middleſex on the N. It is about thirty-four miles long and twenty-one in breadth, containing thirteen hundreds, 140 pariſhes, ten of which are in Southwark and the parts adjacent; alſo eleven market-towns, thirty-five vicarages, 450 villages and hamlets, with 171,000 inhabitants. This is a healthy county, having in it ſeveral royal palaces, with numberleſs ſeats of nobility, gentry and merchants, more eſpecially in the parts W. of London, and along the Thames that way; yet the air, as well as the ſoil of the middle and extreme parts, differs greatly; for the climate of the latter is mild, being very fruitful in corn and hay, with a fine intermixture of woods, fields, and meadows, eſpecially on the S. part about Holmſdale, and on the N. Towards the Thames; but the air is bleak in the heart of the county, which, a delightful ſpot here and there excepted, is open ſandy ground, or barren heath: for which reaſon this county has not been improperly compared to coarſe cloth, with a fine liſt or border. In ſome places are long ridges of hills or downs; with warrens for rabbits, ſhelter for hares, and parks for deer. Its principal rivers, beſides the noble Thames on its N. ſkirts, are the Mole, the Wey, and the Wandle, which abound in fiſh; the laſt of theſe excels particularly in fine trout. The chief produce of this county, beſides corn, are box-wood, walnuts, and fullers-earth; which laſt article, ſo ſerviceable in the cloathing cloathing trade, is ſold at a groat a buſhel from the pits near Rygate. It gave formerly title to the earl, who in the abſence of king Henry VIII. at the ſiege of Tournay, fought the bloody battle of Floddenfield in Northumberland, againſt the Scots under James IV. in which that king fell, fighting valiantly at the head of his nobles, and thereupon his men were routed, and at preſent to the duke of Norfolk; and ſents to parliament, beſides two knights of the ſhire, two members for each of the boroughs of Southwark, Blechingly, Ryegate, Guildford, Gatton, and Haſlemere.

SU'SSEX, S. a county of England, during the heptarchy called the country of the South Saxons. It is bounded on the W. by Hampſhire; on the S. by the Britiſh channel; on the N. by Surrey; and on the E. by Kent. Its extent along the channel is ſixty-five miles, and twenty-nine in breadth. It is divided into ſix rapes, with a caſtle, river, and foreſt to each; and it is further ſubdivided into ſixty-five hundreds, in which are reckoned 312 pariſhes, 123 vicarages, one city, eighteen market-towns, 1060 villages, hamlets, and chapelries, with about 129,000 inhabitants. Its principal rivers are the Arun, the Adur, the Ouſe, and the Rother; but none of theſe will admit a veſſel of 500 tons, by reaſon of the ſand and beach thrown up by the ſea into their mouths. Beſides theſe, there are likewiſe the Lavant, the Cuckmeer, the Aſhburn, and Aſten, which have all, as well as the former rivers, their ſource and exit in this county. The air along the coaſt is aguiſh; but is ſweet and healthy on the downs. The ſoil differs; for the hilly parts are leſs fruitful, and the valleys deep and dirty, but fertile withal; eſpecially the Weald, which produces plenty of oats and hops. The air here, though foggy, and not reckoned unwholeſome by the natives, cannot, one would think, be ſaid to be proper to breathe in. The roads in this part are the worſt in England. On the coaſt are very high green hills, called the South Downs, and well known, eſpecially to the dealers in wool or ſheep; there being great numbers of the latter bred here, whoſe wool, which is very fine, has been too often clandeſtinely exported to France, &c. and ſmuggling or running of brandies, teas, &c. in return, uſed alſo to be much carried on in theſe parts; but the juſt ſeverity of our laws has quite cruſhed that pernicious commerce within theſe few years. Many parts of the downs, being a fat and chalky ſoil, are very fruitful both in corn and graſs. The middle part of the county is delightfully intermixed with meadows, paſture grounds, groves, and corn fields. The north quarter is covered moſtly with woods, from which the royal docks are ſupplied with timber, and the iron works with fuel, there being plenty of ore on the E. ſide towards Kent; and the beſt gunpowder in the world is made in this county, eſpecially at Battle. Suſſex is particularly famous for that delicious bird the wheat-ear, which is ſo highly prized, and is fatteſt when the wheat is ripe. This county has given title of earl to ſeveral families; but now to that of Yelverton, Talbot Lord Viſcount Longueville having been ſo created by king George I. It ſends to parliament two knights of the ſhire, and the ſame number of members for each of the following boroughs of Horſham, Midhurſt, Lewes, Shoreham, Bramber, Steyning, Eaſt Grinſted, and Arundel.

SWE'ATY, Adj. liable to ſwet; wet with ſweat.

SWE'AT-

SWE'ATINESS, S. the quality of abounding with ſweat.

SWE'DEN, S. in Latin Suecia, one of the northern kingdoms of Europe, comprehending the greateſt part of Scandinavia. It is bounded on the S. by the Baltic ſea, the Sound, and the Categat or Skagerack; on the W. by the unpaſſable mountains of Norway; on the north by Norwegian or Daniſh Lapland; and on the E. by Muſcovy. It lies between lat. 56 and 69 deg. N. and between long. 10 and 30 deg. E. being upwards of 800 miles long from N. to S. and 50 broad from E. to W. including the Bothnic and Finnic gulphs: there are alſo ſeveral large lakes in this country, ſome above eighty Engliſh miles in length, and twenty in breadth. It abounds with rocks, mountains, foreſts, woods, heaths, and marſhes; ſo that the habitable part has a very ſmall proportion, comparatively ſpeaking, to the extent of the whole; but the foreſts and woods produce pine, fir, beech, birch, alder, juniper-tree, and ſome oak. It is in general a wretched cold country, with few navigable rivers in it, but abundance of cataracts in them. The ſoil, in thoſe places which are capable of cultivation, is tolerably fruitful, though ſeldom above half a foot deep, and frequently for that reaſon plowed with eaſe by a maid and an ox: the beſt parts are the little ſpaces between the rocks. In Sweden there is a mine of ſilver, and another of copper, beſides innumerable mines of iron, and forges, from which, with naval ſtores and wooden ware, ariſe the chief commodities of the country: in return for which, they receive from abroad ſalt, wines, brandy, cloths, ſtuffs, tobacco, ſugar, ſpices, linen, and ſeveral other ſorts of goods, which commonly balance their exports, and ſometimes exceed them. The management of the trade in Sweden has always been chiefly in the hands of ſtrangers, many of the natives wanting either capacity, induſtry, or application, and all of them ſtock, to carry it on. As the winter in Sweden commonly begins very ſoon, there being about nine months of it; ſo the ſummer immediately ſucceeds it; the heat of which is ſo intenſe, the ſun almoſt continually ſhining, that it often ſets the woods, it is ſaid, on fire, which hardly ſtops till it comes to ſome lake or very large plain. In this ſeaſon the fields are covered with a variety of flowers, and the whole country overſpread with ſtrawberries, currants, &c. growing on every rock. Wall-fruits are as ſcarce as oranges. They have cherries of ſeveral ſorts, and ſome tolerably good, which cannot be ſaid of their apples, pears, or plumbs, neither being common or well taſted. All kinds of roots are in great plenty, and theſe eſpecially are a great ſupport to the poorer inhabitants. The ſun at the higheſt is above the horizon of Stockholm eighteen hours and a half, and for ſome weeks makes continual day: in winter it is but five hours and a half; but the moon, whiteneſs of the ſnow, and clearneſs of the night, ſo well ſupply the defect, that travelling by nights is as uſual as by day. They have ſtoves within doors, and warm furs abroad; the meaner ſort uſing ſheep-ſkins and the like; a neglect or failure in which occaſions the loſs of noſes, &c. and ſometimes of life, unleſs the part affected, or nipped by the froſt, be carefully rubbed with the ſnow till the blood returns to it. The reformation here, as well as in Denmark and Norway, begun ſoon after the neighbouring parts of Germany had embraced Luther's tenets: and now Lutheraniſm is the eſtabliſhed religion, and is never diſturbed by non-conformity, no other ſects, not the Romaniſts, being tolerated. The church is governed by an archbiſhop, namely, Upſal, with a revenue not above 400l. and by ten biſhops; under the latter are ſeven or eight ſuperintendants. Over every ten churches is a provoſt, or rural dean. The number of churches in Sweden and Finland is ſhort of 2000, to which the addition of chaplains and curates will increaſe the clergy to about 4000; who are all ſaid to be the ſons of peaſants or meaner burghers, their dues ariſing from glebe-lands and one-third of the tythes, the other two-thirds being annexed to the crown for pious uſes. The clergy, however, have generally wherewithal to exerciſe hoſpitality, and are the conſtant refuge of poor travellers or ſtrangers. Learning can plead no great antiquity in this country, the univerſity of Upſal not having been founded quite 400 years; and there are few monuments extant of an earlier date, except funeral inſcriptions cut on rocks and rude ſtones, but generally without any date, in the ancient Gothic language, and Runic characters. The moſt curious piece of learning among them is the original tranſlation of the Evangeliſts into the Gothic, done above 12 or 1300 years ago, by Upſala, a biſhop of the Goths in Thrace. Marriages in Sweden are totally governed by the will of the parents, and founded upon intereſt. In their wedding-entertainments they have ever affected pomp and ſuperfluity; as alſo in their funeral ſolemnities. The general diviſion of Sweden is, 1. into the Gothic kingdom, including Eaſt Gothland, Weſt Gothland, and South Gothland. 2. Sweden Proper. 3. Nordland. 4. Lapland. And, 5. Finland.

To SWEEP, V. A. [ſwapan, Sax.] to clean or drive away with a broom; to trail along the ground; to paſs over with quickneſs; to rub over; to ſtrike with a long ſtroke. Neuterly, to paſs with violence or ſwiftneſs; to paſs with pomp or a flowing train; to move with a long ſtroke or reach.

SWEEP, S. the act of cleaning with a broom; the compaſs of any violent or continued motion; violent deſtruction; the direction of any motion from one ſide to another.

SWEET, Adj. [ſwete, Sax. ſoet, Belg.] pleaſing to any of the ſenſes; of an agreeable taſte, as ſugar, &c. Figuratively, charming, grateful, or pleaſing. Kind or good, applied to temper. To be ſweet upon, to be amorouſly fond of.

SWELL, S. an increaſe of bulk.

SWE'LLING, S. a tumor; any thing grown bigger by extenſion.

To SWE'LTER, V. N. [perhaps corrupted from ſultry] to be pained or made uneaſy by heat. Actively, to parch or dry with heat.

SWE'LTRY, Adj. ſuffocating with heat.

SWEPT, participle and preter of Sweep.

To SWERVE, V. N. [ſwerven, Sax. and Belg.] to wander; to rove; to depart from reaſon or duty; to ply or bend.

SWIFT, Adj. [Sax.] moving far in a ſhort time; quick; ready.

SWIFT, (Dr. JONATHAN) was the ſon of Mr. Jonathan Swift, and Mrs Abigail Erick, and was born in Dublin, November 30, 1667. Soon after his birth his nurſe, having occaſion to come to England, out of a nurſe's fondneſs for the child at her breaſt, conveyed him on ſhip-board without the knowledge of his mother or other relations, and kept him with her at Whitehaven, in Cumberland, for three years. This circumſtance occaſioned many to ſuppoſe him an Engliſhman; and, from the friendſhip ſhewed afterwards to his mother and him by Sir William Temple, that he was Sir William's natural ſon; but both theſe ſuggeſtions are equally deſtitute of truth; for Sir William Temple, being employed in a public capacity abroad from the year 1665 to 1670, could not poſſibly have any criminal converſe with his mother till ſome years after his birth. At ſix years of age he was put to Kilkenny ſchool by his uncle, Mr. Godwin Swift (who, upon his father's death, whoſe chief income ceaſed with himſelf, voluntarily became his and the other childrens guardian) and about eight years afterwards was entered a ſtudent of Trinity College, Dublin. His principal ſtudies here were hiſtory and poetry, in which he made great progreſs; but ſo little application did he give to all other branches of ſcience, that when he appeared as candidate for bachelor of arts, he was at firſt ſet aſide on account of inſufficiency and even at laſt obtained his admiſſion ſpeciali gratiâ. This treatment he reſented ſo much, that he reſolved to leave Ireland and purſue his ſtudies at Oxford; but in order to this, he was obliged to produce the teſtimonium of his degree; and the expreſſion ſpeciali gratiâ being peculiar to Dublin univerſity, the members at Oxford concluded it ſignified a degree conferred in reward of extraordinary diligence and learning, and therefore he was immediately admitted, and entered of Hart-hall, now Hartfort College, where he conſtantly reſided till he took his degree of maſter of arts in 1691. Swift's guardian dying in 1688, Sir William Temple, whoſe lady was related to Swift's mother, generouſly ſupported him at Oxford; and, upon his quitting the univerſity, took him to reſide with him as his domeſtic companion. Here Swift had opportunities of converſing with king William, who frequently viſited Sir William Temple; and that prince offered to make him a captain of horſe, which he refuſed, being determined to take orders. In purſuance of this reſolution, he went to Ireland, and by the recommendation of Sir William Temple to lord Capel, then lord deputy, he obtained a prebend of 100 l. a year; but that income being inſufficient, and the diſtance of the metropolis depriving him of that converſation and ſociety in which he delighted, he reſigned his prebend in favour of a friend, and returned to Sheane in England to Sir William Temple, with whom he lived as a companion and friend till Sir William's death; who, beſides a legacy, left to him the care of publiſhing his poſthumous works. Upon the death of Sir William, Swift came to London, and took the earlieſt opportunity of reminding king William, by petition, of a promiſe that prince had made to Sir William Temple, that Mr. Swift ſhould have the firſt vacancy that happened among the prebends of Weminſter or Canterbury; but that petition had no effect; and, after a long and fruitleſs attendance at Whitehall, Swift's honour, or rather pride, not brooking ſo long a ſtate of ſervility and contempt, he embraced an offer made him by the earl of Berkley, then appointed one of the lords juſtices, to attend him as his chaplain and private ſecretary to Ireland. But one Buſh, another of lord Berkley's attendants, ſoon after their arrival in Dublin, by his inſinuations, ſupplanted him in the office of ſecretary. Of this injurious treatment Swift expreſſed his ſenſibility in a ſhort but ſatirical copy of verſes, intitled, The Diſcovery. However, during the government of the earls of Berkley and Galway, who were jointly lords juſtices of Ireland, the livings of Laracor and Rathbeggan, worth together about 260 l. a year, were beſtowed upon Mr. Swift, the only church preferments he enjoyed till he was appointed dean of St. Patrick's in 1713. In 1710, Swift took his doctor's degree, and king William dying towards the latter end of that year, on the acceſſion of queen Anne, the doctor came into England; and as the miniſters of that reign were great patrons of learning and learned men, the doctor was ſoon admitted into their friendſhip, particularly the earl of Oxford, in the defence of whoſe adminiſtration he wrote many pamphlets, poems, and weekly papers, fraught with wit and the keeneſt ſatire. In return for theſe ſervices, the Dr. flattered himſelf the place of hiſtoriographer was reſerved for him; but he remained without preferment till he was made dean of St. Patrick's; and at firſt he had little reaſon to be pleaſed with his promotion; for on his arrival in Ireland to take poſſeſſion of his deanry, he found the violence of party raging to a high degree in that kingdom; the common people had been taught to look look upon him as a jacobite; and ſuch was their deteſtation of him as to throw ſtones at him as he paſſed the ſtreets; the chapter of St. Patrick's, like the reſt of the kingdom, received him with reluctance, and thwarted him in every thing he propoſed; he was avoided as a peſtilence, oppoſed as an invader, and pointed out as an enemy to his country. A man of fewer abilities and leſs firmneſs, would have ſunk under ſuch violent outrages and oppoſition; but he had addreſs and reſolution to ſurmount them; to reduce his brethren the clergy to reaſon and obedience, and, by a zealous attachment to the intereſts of his country, to become the darling of the people; and in this happy ſituation he lived many years, being conſulted in all points relating to domeſtic policy in general, and to the trade of Ireland in particular, till the year 1736, when he was ſeized with a violent giddineſs, which in a few years gradually deprived him of his reaſon, at laſt ſunk him into a ſpeechleſs ideot, and about the latter end of October, 1745, put a period to his life. Few men have had a greater ſhare of humour than the doctor, which he could not reſtrain even upon the moſt trivial occaſions; but from his works, which are univerſally read, the reader will better judge of him than from any thing we can ſay here.

SWI'TZERLAND, S. the country of the thirteen Swiſs Cantons, viz. Zurich, Berne, Lucerne, Ury, Switz, Underwald, Zug, Glaris, Baſil, Friburg, Solothurn, Schaffhauſen, and Appenzel, and of their allies and ſubjects, namely, the Griſons, Valeſians, the republic of Geneva, the biſhopric of Baſil, Mulhauſen, the ſovereignties of Neufchatel and Valengin, the republic of St. Gaul, and the towns of Biena and Rotweil, was that of the ancient Helvetii. It is bounded by the Suntgow, the Hircynian foreſt, and other parts of Swabia, on the N. by the lake of Conſtance, alſo Tyrol and Trent, on the E. by Savoy, Milan, and other provinces of Italy, on the S. and by Burgundy and the Franche-Comté on the W. It is about 260 miles long, and upwards of 100 broad; ſome parts of Italy and France being now included in it, which did not belong to the antient Helvetii. Tho' Switzerland is ſituated between lat. 45 and 48 deg. N. yet lying among the Alps, the higheſt mountains of Europe, whoſe tops are moſt part of the year covered with ſnow, the air is much ſharper than in more northerly latitudes. As the whole country is thus ſequeſtered by high mountains from the neighbouring parts, hardly any one canton but is divided from the reſt by a ridge of hills, which yield good paſture; and on ſome are corn fields, particularly Berne, two thirds of which is a level country, abounding in grain: but the ſoil in general does not produce it in any great quantity, ſtorms or cold rains frequently deſtroying the fruits of the earth; for which reaſon, in plentiful ſeaſons, they lay up corn in granaries; and to retrench all ſuperfluity, they prohibit the wearing of gold, ſilver, ſilk, thread-lace, or jewels, with public ſhews. The three ſmall cantons of Uri, Switz, and Underwald, in order to free themſelves from the tyranny of the emperor's vicars or judges, whoſe oppreſſions and inſolence were become intolerable, entered into a confederacy, and took up arms January 1, 1308; to which the famous Tell did very much contribute. In 1315, Leopold, archduke of Auſtria, brought againſt them an army of 20,000 men; but was defeated by them near Morgarten, in Switz: after which victory they ſolemnly renewed their confederacy, and all the other cantons ſucceſſively acceded to it; which in time formed the thirteen confederated cantons. In the general diet, the Helvetic body is repreſented by deputies from all the cantons, who meet at Baden on Midſummer-day, and ſit for about a month. Here they principally concert meaſures for the good of the whole; but all other matters are treated of at the particular diets of the reſpective religions; as that of the Proteſtants is holden at Aurau, and that of the Roman Catholics at Lucerne; ſo that in fact the thirteen cantons, though generally reputed one commonwealth, are ſo many independent republics. The conſtitution of government in the ſeven cantons of Zurich, Berne, Lucerne, Baſil, Friburg, Solothurn, and Schaffhauſen, is ariſtocratical, or in the gentry; and that of the other ſix democratical, or in the body of the people. The proteſtant or calviniſtical cantons are Zurich, Berne, Baſil, and Schaffhauſen, two-thirds of Glaris, and more than half Appenzel; all the reſt are Roman Catholics; but the Proteſtants are much the largeſt, and their territories more fruitful than thoſe of the other. The cantons never have any troops in pay, but in time of war. All the inhabitants of Switzerland are regularly enrolled in a body of militia, from ſixteen to ſixty years of age, one-third of which is regimented for foreign ſervices, under the ſtile of fuzileers; and the other two-thirds, who ſtay at home, ſerve as recruits for them; and they have had 80,000 men in arms, though only the regimented or inrolled troops were raiſed. In the mountains of Switzerland many large rivers have their ſource, particularly the Adda, Ticino, Lintz, Aar, Ruſe, Inn, Ill, Rhone, and Rhine; alſo the Danube riſes but a few leagues off Schaffhauſen. In this country there are near thirty lakes, ſome of which, particularly thoſe of Conſtance and Geneva, are upwards of ſixty miles long; beſides, there is hardly a mountain but has a lake on its top well ſtored with fiſh. In almoſt every part of this country, both on the mountains and in the plains, are foreſts of firs and pines, with ſome of oak and elm.

VI'LLIERS [George] duke of Buckingham, ſon of the duke of Buckingham, who was murdered by Felton; who, if he was inferior to his father as a ſtateſman, was ſuperior in wit, and wanted only application to have made a very great figure, even in the ſenate; but his love of pleaſure was immoderate, which embarraſſed him in the purſuit of any thing ſolid or praiſe-worthy. He was an infant when his father's murder was perpetrated, and received his early education from ſeveral domeſtic tutors, and was afterwards ſent to the univerſity of Cambridge: when he had finiſhed his courſe there, he travelled with his brother lord Francis. Upon his return, which was after the breaking out of the civil wars, he was conducted to Oxford, and preſented to his majeſty, then there, and entered into Chriſt-church. Upon the decline of the king's cauſe, the young duke of Buckingham attended prince Charles into Scotland, and was preſent in the year 1651, at the battle of Worceſter, whence he eſcaped beyond ſea, and was ſoon after made knight of the garter. He came afterwards privately into England, and, November 19, 1657, married Mary, the daughter and heireſs of Thomas lord Fairfax, by whoſe intereſt he recovered all or moſt of his eſtate, which he had loſt before. After the reſtoration, at which time he is ſaid to have poſſeſſed an eſtate of 20,000l. per annum, he was made one of the lords of the king's bed-chamber, and of the privy council, lord lieutenant of Yorkſhire, and, at laſt, maſter of the horſe. In the year 1666, being diſcovered to have maintained ſecret correſpondence by letters, and other tranſactions, tending to raiſe mutinies among ſome of his majeſty's forces, and ſtir up ſedition among his people, and to have carried on other traiterous deſigns and practices, he abſconded, upon which a proclamation was iſſued the ſame year, for apprehending him. Notwithſtanding this appearance of reſentment againſt him, Charles, who was far from being of an implacable temper, took Buckingham again into favour, after he had made an humble ſubmiſſion; he was reſtored to his place in the council, and in the bed-chamber, in 1667, and ſeemed perfectly confirmed in the good graces of the king, who was, perhaps, too much charmed with his wit to conſider him as an enemy. In the year 1670, the duke was ſuppoſed to be concerned in Blood's attempt on the life of the duke of Ormond. This ſcheme was to have conveyed that nobleman to Tyburn, and there to have hanged him; for which purpoſe he was taken out of his coach in St. James's ſtreet, and carried away by Blood and his ſon, beyond Devonſhire-houſe, Piccadilly, but then reſcued. In June 1671, the duke was inſtalled chancellor of the univerſity of Cambridge, and the ſame year was ſent ambaſſador to the king of France; who being pleaſed with his perſon and errand, entertained him very nobly for ſeveral days together; and upon his taking leave, gave him a ſword and belt ſet with pearls and diamonds, to the value of 40,000 piſtoles. He was afterwards ſent to that king at Utrecht, in June 1672, together with Henry earl of Arlington, and George lord Halifax. He was one of the cabal at Whitehall, and in the beginning of the ſeſſion of parliament, February 1672, endeavoured to caſt the odium of the Dutch war from himſelf, upon lord Arlington, another of the cabal. In June 1674, he reſigned the chancellorſhip of Cambridge. About this time he became a great favourer of the nonconformiſts. February 16, 1676, his grace, and James earl of Saliſbury, Anthony earl of Shaftſbury, and Philip Lord Wharton, were committed to the Tower, by order of the houſe of lords, for a contempt, in refuſing to retract what they had ſaid the day before, when the duke, immediately after his majeſty had ended his ſpeech to both houſes, endeavoured to ſhew, from law and reaſon, that the long prorogation was nulled, and the parliament was conſequently diſſolved. The chief of our author's works is, The Rehearſal, a comedy, firſt acted on December 7, 1661. The character of Bayes is inimitably drawn; in it the various foibles of poets (whether good, bad, or indifferent) are ſo excellently blended, as to make the moſt finiſhed picture of a poetical coxcomb: it is ſuch a maſter-piece of true humour as will ever laſt, while our Engliſh tongue is underſtood, or the ſtage affords a good comedian to play it. It is allowed by the ſevereſt enemies of this nobleman, that he had a great ſhare of vivacity, and quickneſs of parts, which were particularly turned to ridicule; but while he has been celebrated as a wit, all men are ſilent as to his virtues; for it is no where recorded, that he ever performed one generous diſintereſted action in his whole life. He died April 16, 1687, Mr. Wood ſays, at his houſe in Yorkſhire; but Mr. Pope informs us, that he died at an inn in that county, in very mean circumſtances.

VIRGINIA, S. a Britiſh colony of North-America, firſt diſcovered by the celebrated Sir Walter Raleigh in 1584, and had its name from our Virgin Queen. It is very happily ſituated, with the river Patowmack on the N. E. ſeparating it from Maryland and the Atlantic ocean on the E. Carolina on the S. and the Apalachian mountains on the W. which divide it from that vaſt tract called Louiſiana. On the W. ſide of Cheaſapeak-bay, it extends from lat. 36 deg. 30 min. to 39 deg. 30 min. N. but on the E. ſide only from Cape Charles in lat. 37 deg. 13 min. to 28 deg. N. Its breadth, ſo far as planted, is about 100 miles; but to the weſtward it has no boundary. The N. and W. winds here are either very ſharp and piercing, or ſtormy; and the S. and S. E. hazy or ſultry. Snow falls in great quantities, but ſeldom lies above two days; and the ſame may be ſaid of the froſt, the winters in this country being generally dry and clear. The ſpring is earlier than ours; May and June are very pleaſant, July and Auguſt ſultry, but September has prodigious rains. Towards the coaſt, and for 100 miles inland, there is hardly a hill or ſtone to be found. Here are trees of various ſorts, and of prodigious magnitude; with abundance of paſture grounds. The land produces rice, hemp, Indian corn, flax, ſilk, cotton, and wild-grapes: but the ſtaple commodity of Virginia is tobacco, to which the planters poſtpone every thing elſe. That of Virginia, eſpecially the ſweet-ſcented tobacco, which grows on York-river, is reckoned the beſt in the world, and generally vended in Great-Britain and Ireland, for ſmoaking, ſnuff, &c. the other ſort, called Oronoko, is ſent to Holland, Denmark, Sweden, and Germany; where it turns to equal account for the planter. Virginia contains fifty-four pariſhes and churches, thirty or forty of which have miniſters, with chapels of eaſe in thoſe of large extent: the maintenance of each miniſter is ſettled at 1600 pounds of tobacco per annum, beſides perquiſites. In this colony are ſaid to be only two Preſbyterian, and three Quaker meeting-houſes. At Middleplantation, or Williamſburg, there is a college. Though the uſual method of traffic in this country is by barter of one commodity with another, or of any with tobacco, they have Engliſh and Spaniſh coins in ſilver. When any perſon in Virginia is diſabled, thro' age or ſickneſs, he is placed in ſome planter's houſe at the public charge; and ſuch is the hoſpitality of the planters to ſtrangers, that here is no need of inns. Of late only they have begun to build forts, depending chiefly on a well-regulated militia on land, and cruizers from England at ſea. Though Virginia abounds in fine timber and naval ſtores, and it is one grand harbour after entering Cheaſapeak-bay, between Cape Charles and Henry; yet they build no ſhipping. As here are few towns, James town and Williamſburg being the principal, the planters reſide on their farms, which lie contiguous to ſome large river; ſo that ſhips come up almoſt to their doors, and take in tobacco for their lading.

It is pretended to have been founded by Kymbeline, or Cimbeline, who flourished in the time of our Saviour, and indeed it seems to have been eminent in the Roman times. It was almost consumed by fire in 1694; but was magnificently rebuilt by the voluntary contributions of the nation, the stone being dug from the rock on which it stands. Four ways lead to it, answering the four points, which terminate in four streets meeting in the center of the town. It is supplied with water by pipes from springs about half a mile distant. Here is a castle strong both by nature and art, being built upon a rock forty fathoms from the river, and was formerly of great consequence in time of war. It is now the seat of lord Brook. The town has a considerable trade in malt; and though populous, has but two parishes, and yet it has a fine hospital, and three charity schools. The corporation is governed by a mayor, 12 brethren, and 24 burgesses, and sends 2 members to parliament. It gives title of earl to the family of Rich, as it did formerly to the Nevil. It hath five fairs, viz. on the first Monday in Lent, May day, Midsummer, St. Bartholomew, and St. Simon and Jude. Markets, Tuesday, Friday, and Saturday. Lat. 53 deg. 20 min. long. 1 deg. 32 min. and distant from London 88 miles.
